However, it is reasonably certain that in such as "The Bird of Fire" and the "Pathetic" symphony heard at this concert Dr. Koussevitzky is supreme as an interpreter. The performance was well nigh perfection. Such performances are memorable and where will one hear the like excepting by the Boston orchestra?

The third concert of the series will be given on Thursday evening, December 5.

H. J. Storer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NOV 26

Benefit for Russian Exiles

Mrs. Henry P. Loomis, president of the American Society for Relief of Russian Exiles, Inc., announced yesterday that the Boston Symphony Orchestra,

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NOV 26

Benefit for Russian Exiles.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will give an extra matinée performance on Jan. 10 at Carnegie Hall for the benefit of the AAmerican Society for the Relief of Russian Exiles, Inc., of which Mrs. Henry P. Loomis is president.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

At a recent rehearsal, Serge Koussevitsky, the well-tailored director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, emphasized an entrance cue with a characteristic gesture of both hands. The strings responded half a beat late. He repeated the gesture and this time the strings anticipated him by half a beat. Was there an outburst of Slavic fury? "Nu," merely sighed the refined Mr. Koussevitsky, "let's try it again!"

Great Ovation In Middle West

Reports Here Say Boston Orchestra Has Been Accorded Big Reception

Nothing could exceed the ovation given the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its distinguished conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, during their recent tour of the Middle West, according to report, for the reception accorded each concert marked a new triumph for both musicians and leader. The orchestra, due to appear at the Mosque the night of February 3, under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene and T. Michaux Moody, as part of the series of concerts for which tickets are now selling at Wallace D. Moses and Company, visited Minneapolis for the first time in forty years, when it was conducted by Arthur Nikisch, and the critic of the star said of it:

"Without giving way to the impulse to use superlatives, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Koussevitzky must be conceded to be a great orchestra, a supremely great orchestra. The gift to Minneapolis music lovers last evening was a revelation of what symphonic music can be . . . and it is said with no disrespect to our own orchestra. The enjoyment it aroused was of the kind that leaves the concertgoer in an exhausted, inarticulate state, drained dry of emotion and ecstacy." The critic of the Chicago Post was equally enthusiastic following the concert given there by the orchestra, saying: "The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its distinguished conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, gave a concert last evening worthy of its great tradition.

"The Tschaikowsky 'Pathetique' symphony was superb. It was conceived with a depth of feeling and set forth with a breadth and dignity that gave an elemental power. It had in it nothing of the petty nor trivial, nothing of the morbid that comes from the individual's brooding over his private griefs."

Of the conductor himself, Glenn Dillard Dunn, in the Chicago Herald and Examiner, had a very definite opinion, for he declared that "Dr. Koussevitzky is, of course, a great dramatist of the symphony, an artist of true orchestral imagination, a master of color and of contrast in all its myriad inflections, whether instrumental or dynamic. He plays with the orchestra and upon the emotional and sensuous responses of his listeners. But his is, nevertheless, a sincere and simple nature."

Boston Programs.

This week the Boston Symphony orchestra is on tour, with New York and Brooklyn on the list for the customary programs. Next week Mr. Koussevitsky will take a brief vacation and the regular Boston concerts of the orchestra will be conducted by the concert master, Richard Burgin. The soloist will be Jacques Thibaud, the eminent violinist, in the Saint-Saens Concerto in B minor. With a fellow violinist leading the orchestra he should have sympathetic support.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

Society en masse attended the first concert of the season presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, at the Albee Theatre on Tuesday evening. Unlike several of its predecessors, the first concert was not formally ushered in by President Emeritus William H. P. Faunce of Brown University. It needed no introduction, because the personnel was the same as last year, and its symphonic offerings, with one notable exception, had been heard in this city before.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Nov 3

Richard Burgin is to conduct the Thanksgiving week concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its home city. A guest soloist there is the French violinist, Jacques Thibaud.

WHICH reminds me that Gordon tells me that he told Stock what the leader of the Boston Symphony said to him after he had assured Koussevitzky that it was literally true that Stock could and did conduct the entire classic repertory and most of the modern without a score in front of him. And when Gordon told Stock that Koussevitzky had then said, "I admire your loyalty, but on the level, now, does Stock really know his stuff or fake it like Stokowsky?" the Chicago conductor answered: "But the real joke is that Stokowsky does know his stuff. Don't let anybody fool you about the leader of the Philadelphia Symphony—he knows."

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

The Observation Post

By Walter Brown, Dramatic Editor

Some Music in New York.

There was to be a football game in Cambridge last Saturday, and the Hartford station was full of Yale men at about 8:15, and on every side was a football greeting. But I had plans to see some Massachusetts playing in New York—and the Yale crowd went its way toward what happened in Cambridge (score given on request—which I do not hear) and I went south—and that, I suppose, is why the types in the Observation Post heading Monday said "Southern" for "Sothern"—to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra play its first afternoon concert in New York this season.

✣ ✣ ✣

Dr. Koussevitzky has been called unduly modern in his tastes by some conservative music-lovers, but in his Thursday and Saturday programs in New York he could hardly be accused of neglecting the tried and true numbers of the classical orchestra list. For at the first concert he gave the "Egmont" overture and the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven and on Saturday afternoon he began with the Handel Concerto Grosso, Op. 6, No. 10 for string orchestra, and ended with the Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 6 (Pathetic)—letting his modernity ride with Ravel's "Mother Goose" pieces and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," on Thursday, and the new-this-year-Gruenberg Symphonic poem "The Enchanted Isle."

✣ ✣ ✣

Of course I wanted to hear the Thursday concert, but I was lucky to get to New York by Saturday and I wish every good Hartford music-lover could have heard that concert with me! In the Handel music there was an absolutely masterful opening of beautifully shaded tone like an organ at its most perfect best—tone so wonderfully blended that the various choirs became as one voice. The Fugue was powerfully, brilliantly played and the lovely "Air" was given in gorgeously simple fashion with the feeling always of splendid power at the conductor's call.

The orchestra was in brilliant form and Dr. Koussevitzky so managed the movement of the Concerto that the intervals were, in the main, unmarred by applause. The third and fourth movements were delightful in charm and the finale was really magnificent—here was string-orchestra playing at its highest and best.

✣ ✣ ✣

Mr. Gruenberg's work was first played at Worcester in October of this year and it is assumed that he heard Mr. Stoessel's reading of it there. He was present at Saturday's concert and was brought to the platform by the smiling Dr. Koussevitzky to share with the orchestra the spontaneous and prolonged applause of the audience, and with good reason he seemed highly pleased at the reading his score had received and the way the audience approved the work.

✣ ✣ ✣

Some musicians doubtless feel—and with reason—that the new composer is repeating in a measure what Tcshaikowsky said in his music more than thirty years ago; but the younger musician tells his tale attractively and well, without the ross exaggerations that some of the modernists feel called on to use in saying the simplest things. He orchestrates admirably—Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave his work a noble reading on Saturday. There was splendor of tone in the brilliant climax; the dreamy qualities of the opening measures, with the impression of singing birds at dawn, were tonally exquisite; the composer's feeling of the unreal—like that ineffable quality in Barrie's "Mary Rose" for example—was splendidly mirrored in the orchestra's tone.

Unexpected harmonies abound in this work—especially in passages assigned to the woodwind of the orchestra; and there was superb playing in this section; the climax, as heretofore indicated, is of fine proportions that dwarf following passages of rather ordinary value—but the work ends in fine writing interpreted in simple finenesses of the orchestra's sustained tones.

✣ ✣ ✣

The Tschaikowsky "Pathetic" is so fine, so appealing a work that it has been "played to death" in the minds of many. But when it is offered by one of the great orchestras it is indeed a blase music-lover who can fail to find a thrill in its beauties, joy in a splendid reading of its greatness.

Dr. Koussevitzky did not sentimentalize in his reading Saturday. He played the symphony as a work of art, not as something in which every shred of sentiment is to be long drawn out, every potential tear turned into a rushing brook. I happened to be sitting in a box with some of those objectionable people who want to control a conductor's idea of tempo and dynamics; but in spite of them the reading of the symphony came to be as profoundly fine, and expressive of all the best in the music without exaggeration of any single baton-beat for the sentiment-mongers or the heart-throbbers. It was Atlantic Monthly rendition rather than tabloid. And it rounded out a splendid concert by a great orchestra under the control of a fine mind.

FOUNDED 1900 BY CHARLES F. FRENCH

FLORENCE FRENCH
EDITOR AND PUBLISHER

MUSICAL LEADER

E. F. SMITH
J. DEMERATH
F. M. WARD

TELEPHONE { 4639 HARRISON 5408
CABLE ADDRESS: MUSICLEAD CHICAGO

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

SUBSCRIPTION: $3.00 FOR YEAR
CANADIAN $4.00 FOR YEAR
FOREIGN $4.50 FOR YEAR

501 MCCORMICK BUILDING
CHICAGO OCT 28 1929 MICHIGAN AVE.

YOUR ATTENTION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH APPEARED IN LAST THURSDAY'S ISSUE OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

* * *

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, states that he is presenting a new work on each of this season's programs. Not all are by modern composers, but all will be heard in this country for the first time.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
OCT 30 1929

Boston Programs.

This week the Boston Symphony Orchestra is on tour, so that there will be the usual interval in the regular series. During the past week it was definitely decided that the orchestra would not make the European tour which had been talked of for next year. The orchestra is to celebrate its 50th anniversary next year.

And it is also felt that it should participate in appropriate manner in the tercentenary celebration of the Bay State Colony. With that view of the situation it is said that Mr. Koussevitzky is in hearty accord.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
NOV 2 - 1929

The Boston Symphony orchestra which is to appear at the Bushnell Memorial in April under the local management of Frank A. Sedgwick, will open its New York season on November 21. The present season marks the forty-ninth of the orchestra's existence and the sixth season under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky. This will be the forty-third series of concerts in New York. The regular season in Boston consists of twenty-four pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, six Monday evening and six Tuesday afternoon concerts. This last series was recently formed for the benefit of suburban friends of the organization. Two tours are projected, a fall trip to the middle west, and a February visit to Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. The orchestra also gives four concerts annually in Providence, and also appears in Hartford, New Haven, Northampton and Springfield. Preparations are now under way for the celebration of the golden jubilee of the founding of the orchestra.

Koussevitzky to Direct Boston Symphony in Hartford Next Spring.

Hartford, Nov. 5—Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a brilliant program at the new Horace Bushnell Memorial hall, Wednesday evening, April 9th.

Through the munificent generosity of Mrs. A. R. Hillyer, Hartford's musical patrons are extremely fortunate finally, in having available, a music hall, suitable for the rendition of a symphony concert, which can be thoroughly enjoyed under perfect conditions. Mr. Koussevitzky is keenly interested in the New Horace Bushnell Music hall, and is looking forward with a great deal of pleasure to conducting an unusually attractive program.

Scientific engineers, who have made an exhaustive study of acoustics (which is the foremost consideration and requisite for the rendition of a musical performance) have given this subject great study and thought in the completion of this hall.

There is every reason to expect that the acoustic properties of the Horace Bushnell Memorial hall will be perfect. Every item of interior treatment and construction was carefully considered from the angle of perfect acoustics by a committee of experts in this line. The chief architect who planned the hall is Harvey Wiley Corbett of New York, who is one of the most famous architects of this day. He is a member of the New York mayor's committee on plans and surveys, former president of the Architectural ...a this morning, pleaded not gu...

Motorcycle Policeman Harper told ... being detailed to conduct the investigation after the accident report ...d been turned into the police station by Gaudette. The witness went to Boyker's home and talking with him he learned that while he was in the car that struck the bus Letitia and not he was the driver. Policeman Harper said that Boyker admitted that his machine had struck the bus, but that Letitia did not consider any damage had been done so he continued along. The police-

...ssing acoustic properties. It is of the suspended type, and covers the auditorium, to form a megaphone. The ceiling steps up as it recedes from the proscenium arch. These steps are calculated to break up the sound waves which will be easily absorbed by specially prepared plaster. The side walls run from the proscenius arch to the rear of the hall in two diverging lines, without interruption, eliminating all pockets. These factors, with other technical details remove all possibility of echoes, the bane of most auditoriums.

Those who have been fortunate enough to have heard the Boston Symphony at Symphony Hall, Boston, or in Carnegie Hall in New York, readily realize the wonderful musical effects which can be produced by orchestras in these auditoriums under ideal surroundings where the acoustics play such an important part.

This season which is the great orchestra's forty-ninth opened in Symphony Hall, Boston, Oct. 11th. The amazing brilliance and tonal glow of the hundred fold instrument, and its sensitive response to the will of its extraordinary Russian conductor makes an impression perhaps more vivid than any other concert of its class. Great things are expected of the coming season.

Mr. Koussevitzky will make the program for Hartford with especial care, combining the finest of the classical music with the most important of the new.

A most unique situation prevails

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN
NOV 13 1929

Boston Programs.

At the regular concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week Friday and Saturday Mr. Koussevitzky purposes to present the Nocturne and Turkish music for wind instruments by Spohr, originally set for last week. This, it is said, has never been performed in Boston. For further novelty on the program will be Eicheim's musical sketches "Burma" and "Java" based on first-hand study of music in those countries. The programs will be rounded out again this week with Strauss, this time the Symphonia Domestica being the conductor's choice.

The Juilard Musical Foudation has arranged for the publication of Louis Gruenberg's Symphonic Poem "Enchanted Isle" which was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week and met with approval.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
NOV 24 1929

Reception

Serge Koussevitsky, idolized conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra occasionally allows himself to be lionized by musical Bostonians. While the reception last Sunday afternoon for the Koussevitskys in the New England Conservatory concert hall and reception rooms was intended chiefly for the staff, students and alumni of the school there were other musicians there, to meet the receiving line headed by President and Mrs. Charles Dennee, during the reception hours from 4.30 o'clock to 6. Several Worcester people drove down to meet the conductor and Mrs. Koussevitsky. Mr. and Mrs. Russell Sanford, Mr. and Mrs. John P. Martin and Mrs. James J. Morrison among them. Mrs. Koussevitsky is charming, but said little as the long line passed the guests of honor. She carried roses and orchids, and wore black and white georgette. Her distinguished husband is decidedly animated in conversation, whether in English, French of Russian, which were the three languages I heard him use. There may have been and probably were more in his repertory. Less tall than one imagines from seeing slim figure on the conductor's stand at the symphony concerts, the guest of honor was vivid, interesting, not alone as a musician but as a man of many activities. A determination to sit behind his baton at the Friday afternoon concerts was one of the immediate reactions on the part of the large gathering at the reception and tea.

He talked, by the way, very little shop in spite of environment and the musicians who surrounded him. Mme. Szumowska was in the teasing throng ... of particular interest to hear ...

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHRONICLE
NOV 15 1929

Second Symphony Concert

The second concert in Sanders theatre of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, was given on Thursday evening of last week. This was the program: Beethoven, Overture to "Egmont"; Stravinsky, Suite from "The Fire Bird" in five short numbers; Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 6 in B minor, "Pathetic," Op. 74.

This program like that of the first concert furnished two numbers of the standard orchestral repertory and the suite from "The Fire Bird" has been given several times so there were no "first time" numbers for one to puzzle over to see what the noise was all about. So that this concert proved interesting in every way. If the concerts to come are as free from ultra-modern, atonal, polytonal or whatever else to keep one guessing for an evening, more than one of the symphony patrons will be exceedingly glad.

The "Egmont" overture is not heard as often as the "Leonore" No. 3, or the "Corislanus" overtures; neither has it been as popular. The "Egmont" was written "to order" and while a good overture is not Beethoven at his best. It was finely played. Dr. Koussevitsky's interpretation of Beethoven will rank high, even if there are those who find something for which to criticize. It has been said that none of the conductors of the Boston orchestra have been equally successful in all schools of composition. Why should they be? There are many viewpoints and who can give an interpretation that will please everyone? The writer has heard all of the Symphony conductors from Mr. Heuschel unto the present and it is certain that all of them did well and maintains the same high standard each in his own manner.

However, it is reasonably certain that in such as "The Bird of Fire" and the "Pathetic" symphony heard at this concert Dr. Koussevitzky is supreme as an interpreter. The performance was well nigh perfection. Such performances are memorable and where will one hear the like excepting by the Boston orchestra?

The third concert of the series will be given on Thursday evening, December 5.

H. J. Storer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
NOV 26 1929

Of Thee I Sing

By Ashton Stevens

WHICH reminds me that Gordon tells me that he told Stock what the leader of the Boston Symphony said to him after he had assured Koussevitzky that it was literally true that Stock could and did conduct the entire classic repertory and most of the modern without a score in front of him. And when Gordon told Stock that Koussevitzky had then said, "I admire your loyalty, but on the level, now, does Stock really know his stuff or fake it like Stokowsky?" the Chicago conductor answered: "But the real joke is that Stokowsky does know his stuff. Don't let anybody fool you about the leader of the Philadelphia Symphony—he knows."

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN
NOV 20 1929

Boston Programs.

This week the Boston Symphony orchestra is on tour, with New York and Brooklyn on the list for the customary programs. Next week Mr. Koussevitzky will take a brief vacation and the regular Boston concerts of the orchestra will be conducted by the concert master, Richard Burgin. The soloist will be Jacques Thibaud, the eminent violinist, in the Saint-Saens Concerto in B minor. With a fellow violinist leading the orchestra he should have sympathetic support.

In Middle West

Reports Here Say Boston Orchestra Has Been Accorded Big Reception

Nothing could exceed the ovation given the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its distinguished conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, during their recent tour of the Middle West, according to report, for the reception accorded each concert marked a new triumph for both musicians and leader.

The orchestra, due to appear at the Mosque the night of February 3 under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene and T. Michaux Moody, part of the series of concerts for which tickets are now selling at Wal... D. Moses and Company, visited Minneapolis for the first time in forty years, when it was conducted by Arthur Nikisch, and the critic of the ... said of it:

"Without giving way to the impulse to use superlatives, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Koussevitzky ... be conceded to be a great orchestra, a supremely great orchestra. ... gift to Minneapolis music lovers ... evening was a revelation of what ...phonic music can be . . . and ... is said with no disrespect to our ... orchestra. The enjoyment it ...used was of the kind that leaves ... concertgoer in an exhausted, inarticulate state, drained dry of emotion and ecstacy." The critic of the Chicago Post was equally enthusiastic ...owing the concert given there by ... orchestra, saying: "The Boston ...mphony Orchestra, under its distinguished conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, gave a concert last evening ...rthy of its great tradition.

"The Tschaikowsky 'Pathetique' symphony was superb. It was conceived ...th a depth of feeling and set forth ...th a breadth and dignity that gave ... elemental power. It had in it ...othing of the petty nor trivial, noth...g of the morbid that comes from the ...ividual's brooding over his private ...iefs."

Of the conductor himself, Glenn ...illard Dunn, in the Chicago Herald ...d Examiner, had a very definite ...inion, for he declared that "Dr. ...oussevitzky is, of course, a great ...amatist of the symphony, an artist ... true orchestral imagination, a mas...r of color and of contrast in all ... myriad inflections, whether instru...ental or dynamic. He plays with ... orchestra and upon the emotional ...nd sensuous responses of his listen...s. But his is, nevertheless, a sin...re and simple nature."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune
NOV 26 1929

Benefit for Russian Exiles

Mrs. Henry P. Loomis, president of the American Society for Relief of Russian Exiles, Inc., announced yesterday that the Boston Symphony Orchestra

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Times
NOV 26 1929

Benefit for Russian Exiles.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will give an extra matinée performance on Jan. 10 at Carnegie Hall for the benefit of the AAmerican Society for the Relief of Russian Exiles, Inc., of which Mrs. Henry P. Loomis is president.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 24 1929

Society en masse attended the first concert of the season presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, at the Albee Theatre on Tuesday evening. Unlike several of its predecessors, the first concert was not formally ushered in by President Emeritus William H. P. Faunce of Brown University. It needed no introduction, because the personnel was the same as last year, and its symphonic offerings, with one notable exception, had been heard in this city before.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Times
NOV 23 1929

Richard Burgin is to conduct the Thanksgiving week concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its home city. A guest soloist there is the French violinist, Jacques Thibaud.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
NOV 29 1929

At a recent rehearsal, Serge Koussevitzky, the well-tailored director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, emphasized an entrance cue with a characteristic gesture of both hands. The strings responded half a beat late. He repeated the gesture and this time the strings anticipated him by half a beat. Was there an outburst of Slavic fury? "Nu," merely sighed the refined Mr. Koussevitzky, "let's try it again!"

The Observation Post

By Walter Brown, Dramatic Editor

Some Music in New York.

There was to be a football game in Cambridge last Saturday, and the Hartford station was full of Yale men at about 8:15, and on every side was a football greeting. But I had plans to see some Massachusetts playing in New York—and the Yale crowd went its way toward what happened in Cambridge (score given on request—which I do not hear) and I went south—and that, I suppose, is why the types in the Observation Post heading Monday said "Southern" for "Sothern"—to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra play its first afternoon concert in New York this season.

✣ ✣ ✣

Dr. Koussevitzky has been called unduly modern in his tastes by some conservative music-lovers, but in his Thursday and Saturday programs in New York he could hardly be accused of neglecting the tried and true numbers of the classical orchestra list. For at the first concert he gave the "Egmont" overture and the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven and on Saturday afternoon he began with the Handel Concerto Grosso, Op. 6, No. 10 for string orchestra, and ended with the Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 6 (Pathetic)—letting his modernity ride with Ravel's "Mother Goose" pieces and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," on Thursday, and the new-this-year-Gruenberg Symphonic poem "The Enchanted Isle."

✣ ✣ ✣

Of course I wanted to hear the Thursday concert, but I was lucky to get to New York by Saturday and I wish every good Hartford music-lover could have heard that concert with me! In the Handel music there was an absolutely masterful opening of beautifully shaded tone like an organ at its most perfect best—tone so wonderfully blended that the various choirs became as one voice. The Fugue was powerfully, brilliantly played and the lovely "Air" was given in gorgeously simple fashion with the feeling always of splendid power at the conductor's call.

The orchestra was in brilliant form and Dr. Koussevitzky so managed the movement of the Concerto that the intervals were, in the main, unmarred by applause. The third and fourth movements were delightful in charm and the finale was really magnificent—here was string-orchestra playing at its highest and best.

✣ ✣ ✣

Mr. Gruenberg's work was first played at Worcester in October of this year and it is assumed that he heard Mr. Stoessel's reading of it there. He was present at Saturday's concert and was brought to the platform by the smiling Dr. Koussevitzky to share with the orchestra the spontaneous and prolonged applause of the audience, and with good reason he seemed highly pleased at the reading his score had received and the way the audience approved the work.

✣ ✣ ✣

Some musicians doubtless feel—and with reason—that the new composer is repeating in a measure what Tschaikowsky said in his music more than thirty years ago; but the younger musician tells his tale attractively and well, without the ross exaggerations that some of the modernists feel called on to use in saying the simplest things. He orchestrates admirably—Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave his work a noble reading on Saturday. There was splendor of tone in the brilliant climax; the dreamy qualities of the opening measures, with the impression of singing birds at dawn, were tonally exquisite; the composer's feeling of the unreal—like that ineffable quality in Barrie's "Mary Rose" for example—was splendidly mirrored in the orchestra's tone.

Unexpected harmonies abound in this work—especially in passages assigned to the woodwind of the orchestra; and there was superb playing in this section; the climax, as heretofore indicated, is of fine proportions that dwarf following passages of rather ordinary value—but the work ends in fine writing interpreted in simple finenesses of the orchestra's sustained tones.

✣ ✣ ✣

The Tschaikowsky "Pathetic" is so fine, so appealing a work that it has been "played to death" in the minds of many. But when it is offered by one of the great orchestras it is indeed a blase music-lover who can fail to find a thrill in its beauties, joy in a splendid reading of its greatness.

Dr. Koussevitzky did not sentimentalize in his reading Saturday. He played the symphony as a work of art, not as something in which every shred of sentiment is to be long drawn out, every potential tear turned into a rushing brook. I happened to be sitting in a box with some of those objectionable people who want to control a conductor's idea of tempo and dynamics; but in spite of them the reading of the symphony came to be as profoundly fine, and expressive of all the best in the music without exaggeration of any single baton-beat for the sentiment-mongers or the heart-throbbers. It was Atlantic Monthly rendition rather than tabloid. And it rounded out a splendid concert by a great orchestra under the control of a fine mind.

REDUCTION

RATIO

16x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

A3

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

THIS CLIPPING FROM

DEC

131

MUSIC OF THE HILLS

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

MR. NIKOLAI SOKOLOFF, who will give a concert with his Cleveland Orchestra next Tuesday evening at Carnegie Hall, has never within our recollection presented an uninteresting program—indeed, he is one of the best four orchestral program-makers in America (the others are Messrs. Koussevitzky, Stokowski and Reiner). Mr. Sokoloff's list for his concert of December 3 is even more interesting than usual. Not only does it contain three promising novelties, concerning which at the moment we cannot speak from personal experience, but it offers a revival of one of these

THIS CLIPPING FROM

A Boston contemporary exclaims that, contrary to general belief, it now appears that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not the "second oldest" in the United States, exceeded in honorable years only by the Philharmonic Society of New York. To the St. Louis Orchestra belongs that distinction; the current musical year is its Jubilee Year; in so many words it affirms the title in a program book:

> With these opening concerts the St. Louis Symphony Society swings into the second half-century of its career. Few realize that since the disappearance a year ago of the New York Symphony Society, it is the second oldest in this country, outranked in this respect only by the New York Philharmonic Society, organized in 1842. It is older than the Boston Symphony Orchestra by a year; than the Chicago Orchestra by fourteen years; than the Philadelphia Orchestra by twenty-three years; than the Minneapolis Orchestra by the same number. All the other symphony orchestras are, compared with it, mere fledglings.

FLORENCE FRENCH
EDITOR AND PUBLISHER

MUSICAL LEADER

E. F. SMITH
J. DEMERATH
F. M. WARD

TELEPHONE { 4839 HARRISON 5408
ADDRESS MUSLEADCH, AGC

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

SUBSCRIPTION $3.00 FOR YEAR
CANADIAN $4.00 FOR YEAR
FOREIGN $4.50 FOR YEAR

CHICAGO.

501 McCORMICK BUILDING
332 SO. MICHIGAN AVE.

DEC 1925

YOUR ATTENTION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH APPEARED IN LAST THURSDAY'S ISSUE OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

Koussevitzky Plays Gruenberg's Work

On Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid the first of its five annual visits to New York. Serge Koussevitzky conducted two programs which aroused the enthusiasm of capacity audiences in Carnegie Hall, including many standees. On Thursday evening the famous Rusisan conductor offered no novelties, but gave a most beautiful and well-balanced performance of the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven which, strange as it may seem, was heard for the first time this season in New York. Preceding this were Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture, Ravel's exquisite score "Ma Mère l'Oye" and Strauss' ever fascinating "Til Eulenspiegel."

Much interest in the Saturday afternoon program was centered in Louis Gruenberg's "The Enchanted Isle." The symphonic poem, heard for the first time in New York, aroused much enthusiasm and Koussevitzky brought the composer on the stage to acknowledge the spontaneous and insistent applause. Composed ten years ago, the work came as a surprise to those who expected an ultra-modern expression from one of our recognized leaders in the contemporary movement. Those who know his "Daniel Jazz," "The Creation," "Jazz Suite" and "Vagabondia" had opportunity to see that Gruenberg had developed naturally and spontaneously with the spirit of the times, but that his art, technic and knowledge are deeply rooted in the traditions of the past. No one who heard "The Enchanted Isle" could doubt the creative ability and skill of its composer. It pays tribute to romanticism and impressionism and is set forth in clear, definite form with an orchestration which reflects mastery, penetrating study and great natural gifts. It is a work of which America may well be proud for it shows a knowledge of music in every form and genuine musicianship, the most important foundation upon which to build ultra-modernism. It was played with devotion and exquisite care of details.

Koussevitzky opened the concert with a subtle performance of Handel's Concerto Grosso for strings, opus 6, No. 10, in which he displayed a high degree of artistic restraint. The program closed with an electrifying performance of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony. As the famous Russian conductor, Wassily Safonoff, said of his own performance of the same work, 'Scratch a Cossack and you find the Tartar!" Koussevitzky's performance had all the fire, contrasting moods and enthusiasm with which only a Russian could invest the work.

Entertainments

MUSICAL LIFE IN AMERICA

II.—IMPORTATION OF CELEBRITIES

(By W. J. Henderson)

The United States contains three cities which maintain seasons of opera—New York, Chicago, and Philadelphia. In the metropolis there is much dissatisfaction with the offerings of the impresario. He has been more successful with revivals than with novelties. Rosa Ponselle in Norma aroused the town. Richard Strauss's Die Aegyptische Helena, Respighi's La Campana Sommersa, Ernest Krenek's Jonny spielt auf and Pizzetti's Fra Gherardo were all lamentable failures. The famous jazz opera, which so excited Germany and which was pronounced a masterpiece by a jazz expert living in Leipzig, was declared by the New York commentators to be sorry stuff and its jazz as little like the real thing as a hawk is like a handsaw. No new American opera was produced. Deems Taylor's The King's Henchman remained perforce in the repertory; his second work is not yet written.

But opera bears no very close relation to the real musical life of the United States. Orchestral concerts and appearances of celebrated vocal and instrumental virtuosi seem to interest the people more. The orchestral situation in New York remains uncertain. The Philharmonic Society is supported by persons of wealth; it does not earn profits. No orchestra can do that, because a public demand for famous conductors has been created and their salaries are so enormous that deficits are inevitable. The Philadelphia Orchestra and the Boston Symphony give series of concerts in New York every season and the latter, which has not suffered from guest conductors but has constantly been under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, may now be regarded as the foremost instrumental organization in the east. Only a small amount of native music is produced by these orchestras, partly because the public has been taught to focus its attention on novel readings of old works by visiting conductors and partly because there is no American composer of important music at present.

The Society of the Friends of Music, which has for years given concerts of unusual character, purposes to widen its field next season by leaving the intimate seclusion of the Town Hall and going to more spacious accommodation in Carnegie Hall. An independent orchestra is later to be organized with Artur Bodanzky, who has resigned from the Opera, as conductor. The probabilities are that the Friends of Music, instead of being a distinguished society devoted to the revelation of neglected art works, will become a commonplace choral body compelled to deal in the wares of Handel and possibly Elgar.

The state of choral music in the United States is at present not clearly defined. In the large cities it has no very firm hold on the public because of the continual excitement of attention by the conjurings of orchestral wizards and the technical exhibitions of distinguished solo performers. Fortunately a few organizations persist in good works. The Oratorio Society of New York, for instance, sustains life by its annual performances of The Messiah and gathers enough funds for two other concerts. At the last of this season it gave Judas Maccabeus, which had enjoyed a long rest. In the same week the Society of the Friends of Music presented Samson. It had shortly before given The Creation. The Schola Cantorum invites attention to concerts of short choral numbers and its programmes are decidedly less interesting than they were a few seasons back. This organization is providing a chorus for the Ninth Symphony at the final concert of the Boston Orchestra. In Cincinnati and some other cities choral festivals are held once a year, and in some of the smaller cities choral music has to take the place of orchestral, which is too expensive for these communities. No choral composition of even minor importance has been produced by any American composer of late. The country lacks the stimulus of such institutions as the festival of the Three Choirs in England. The American composer is persuaded that he can earn a better living by writing songs than by attempting the difficulties of choral music.

The Oxford University Press has done some good work by creating the Bach Cantata Club, which gives concerts of Bach music in churches. Some of these concerts have been stimulating, but some have missed the aim of the movement. They have been instrumental and vocal solo concerts, and little is accomplished by them. But British music and musicians are not neglected here. Harold Samuel continues to play Bach to large audiences, and the London String Quartet, which recently returned, was cordially welcomed. H. Waldo Warner's "Suite in the Olden Style" was played and approvingly received. The English Singers come season after season and they have done much to enlighten this country about the great English part-song writers.

It must appear, then, that the present state of music in the United States is not settled. The elder composers, who pursued the classic ideals even in their romantic endeavours, have passed into comparative obscurity. Their works are rarely heard by a public insatiable in its demand for new excitements. The popular writers cater for the taste of the masses who have no interest in musical art. The young intellectuals are chasing the Gallic will-o'-the-wisp and striving to light their farthing rushlights in the evasive flames of Honegger and Milhaud, who are in their turn borrowing illumination from Stravinsky and Schönberg. There is no native conception of opera; the public mind cannot associate that form of art with its own thought, but habitually regards it as an exotic.

There is no cause for wonder that the United States feeds its musical appetite on imported food. Every famous musician in the world comes here at one time or another, and the public sits up and waits for the next celebrity to arrive on an incoming steamer. We have the best orchestras in the world, and sometimes they play American music, but the audiences are more interested in the conductors' readings of Brahms and Beethoven and in performances of familiar concertos.

Much effort is expended toward the betterment of conditions, but most of it takes the form of offers of prizes. So far no prize composition has got the start of the world. Possibly when the general state of the public mind becomes more settled and intellectual dignity recaptures the respect of the people some vital music may be produced. But at present there is nothing of indubitable immortality in sight.

(Concluded)

 Mr. Henderson's first article appeared in The Times on Saturday, October 26.

The Broadcasting Programmes for to-day and to-morrow and Broadcasting Notes will be found on page 8

TOWNSMAN REPORTER INTERVIEWS KOUSSEVITZKY

The Boston Symphony gave its sixth concert on Wednesday evening in Alumnae Hall, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, veteran conductor and Chevalier of the Legion of Honor. In the intermission Dr. Koussevitzky was kind enough to grant the TOWNSMAN reporter an interview.

Our conversation, which was in French, due to Dr. Koussevitzky's shyness in speaking the less familiar English, took place in a tiny dressing room in the back of the hall. The conductor, tall and courtly and cosmopolitan, at once put me at my ease, because of his charming and warm-hearted smile. I asked him how he liked to play at Wellesley.

"It is enchanting," he cried, "to play in a college town. The whole audience is full of the spirit of youth. One feels it also in Northhampton, at Smith. One can play all music for a college audience—old, new, classical, modern. They are interested in everything."

"How do you find Boston as a 'symphony city'?" I asked him.

"Splendid. The people of Boston have watched the growth of our symphony for fifty years. They appreciate everything. One can play much more new music in Boston than in New York. This winter I plan to give something new at almost every concert, some things for the first time in Boston, some things for the first time in America. It will be very interesting, I hope."

Finally, I inquired about his plans for the summer. He told me that he might spend several weeks here conducting the Massachusetts Music Festival, before going to Europe. Massachusetts must be sensible of the high honor paid to it by the presence of this distinguished conductor.

As the bell rang for the beginning of the second part of the concert, Dr. Koussevitzky bowed a stately bow, smiled a charming smile and said "Good-bye" with a friendly handshake and nod.

WELLESLEY LOCAL

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald-Tribune
DEC 1 - 1929

MUSIC OF THE HILLS

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

MR. NIKOLAI SOKOLOFF, who will give a concert with his Cleveland Orchestra next Tuesday evening at Carnegie Hall, has never within our recollection presented an uninteresting program—indeed, he is one of the best four orchestral program-makers in America (the others are Messrs. Koussevitzky, Stokowski and Reiner). Mr. Sokoloff's list for his concert of December 3 is even more interesting than usual. Not only does it contain three promising novelties, concerning which at the moment we cannot speak from personal [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Times
DEC 1 - 1929

A Boston contemporary exclaims that, contrary to general belief, it now appears that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not the "second oldest" in the United States, exceeded in honorable years only by the Philharmonic Society of New York. To the St. Louis Orchestra belongs that distinction; the current musical year is its Jubilee Year; in so many words it affirms the title in a program book:

With these opening concerts the St. Louis Symphony Society swings into the second half-century of its career. Few realize that since the disappearance a year ago of the New York Symphony Society, it is the second oldest in this country, outranked in this respect only by the New York Philharmonic Society, organized in 1842. It is older than the Boston Symphony Orchestra by a year; than the Chicago Orchestra by fourteen years; than the Philadelphia Orchestra by twenty-three years; than the Minneapolis Orchestra by the same number. All the other symphony orchestras are, compared with it, mere fledglings.

FLORENCE FRENCH
EDITOR AND PUBLISHER

MUSICAL LEADER

E. F. SMITH
J. DEMERATH
F. M. WARD

TELEPHONE } 4839
HARRISON } 5408
CABLE ADDRESS: MUSICLEAD CHICAGO

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

SUBSCRIPTION: $3.00 FOR YEAR
CANADIAN $4.00 FOR YEAR
FOREIGN $4.50 FOR YEAR

CHICAGO.

501 McCORMICK BUILDING
332 SO. MICHIGAN AVE.

DEC 2 1929

YOUR ATTENTION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH APPEARED IN LAST THURSDAY'S ISSUE OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

Koussevitzky Plays Gruenberg's Work

On Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid the first of its five annual visits to New York. Serge Koussevitzky conducted two programs which aroused the enthusiasm of capacity audiences in Carnegie Hall, including many standees. On Thursday evening the famous Rusisan conductor offered no novelties, but gave a most beautiful and well-balanced performance of the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven which, strange as it may seem, was heard for the first time this season in New York. Preceding this were Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture, Ravel's exquisite score "Ma Mère l'Oye" and Strauss' ever fascinating "Til Eulenspiegel."

Much interest in the Saturday afternoon program was centered in Louis Gruenberg's "The Enchanted Isle." The symphonic poem, heard for the first time in New York, aroused much enthusiasm and Koussevitzky brought the composer on the stage to acknowledge the spontaneous and insistent applause. Composed ten years ago, the work came as a surprise to those who expected an ultra-modern expression from one of our recognized leaders in the contemporary movement. Those who know his "Daniel Jazz," "The Creation," "Jazz Suite" and "Vagabondia" had opportunity to see that Gruenberg had developed naturally and spontaneously with the spirit of the times, but that his art, technic and knowledge are deeply rooted in the traditions of the past. No one who heard "The Enchanted Isle" could doubt the creative ability and skill of its composer. It pays tribute to romanticism and impressionism and is set forth in clear, definite form with an orchestration which reflects mastery, penetrating study and great natural gifts. It is a work of which America may well be proud for it shows a knowledge of music in every form and genuine musicianship, the most important foundation upon which to build ultra-modernism. It was played with devotion and exquisite care of details.

Koussevitzky opened the concert with a subtle performance of Handel's Concerto Grosso for strings, opus 6, No. 10, in which he displayed a high degree of artistic restraint. The program closed with an electrifying performance of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony. As the famous Russian conductor, Wassily Safonoff, said of his own performance of the same work, 'Scratch a Cossack and you find the Tartar!" Koussevitzky's performance had all the fire, contrasting moods and enthusiasm with which only a Russian could invest the work.

Entertainments

MUSICAL LIFE IN AMERICA

II.—IMPORTATION OF CELEBRITIES

(By W. J. Henderson)

The United States contains three cities which maintain seasons of opera—New York, Chicago, and Philadelphia. In the metropolis there is much dissatisfaction with the offerings of the impresario. He has been more successful with revivals than with novelties. Rosa Ponselle in Norma aroused the town. Richard Strauss's Die Aegyptische Helena, Respighi's La Campana Sommersa, Ernest Krenek's Jonny spielt auf and Pizzetti's Fra Gherardo were all lamentable failures. The famous jazz opera, which so excited Germany and which was pronounced a masterpiece by a jazz expert living in Leipzig, was declared by the New York commentators to be sorry stuff and its jazz as little like the real thing as a hawk is like a handsaw. No new American opera was produced. Deems Taylor's The King's Henchman remained perforce in the repertory; his second work is not yet written.

But opera bears no very close relation to the real musical life of the United States. Orchestral concerts and appearances of celebrated vocal and instrumental virtuosi seem to interest the people more. The orchestral situation in New York remains uncertain. The Philharmonic Society is supported by persons of wealth; it does not earn profits. No orchestra can do that, because a public demand for famous conductors has been created and their salaries are so enormous that deficits are inevitable. The Philadelphia Orchestra and the Boston Symphony give series of concerts in New York every season and the latter, which has not suffered from guest conductors but has constantly been under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, may now be regarded as the foremost instrumental organization in the east. Only a small amount of native music is produced by these orchestras, partly because the public has been taught to focus its attention on novel readings of old works by visiting conductors and partly because there is no American composer of important music at present.

The Society of the Friends of Music, which has for years given concerts of unusual character, purposes to widen its field next season by leaving the intimate seclusion of the Town Hall and going to more spacious accommodation in Carnegie Hall. An independent orchestra is later to be organized with Artur Bodanzky, who has resigned from the Opera, as conductor. The probabilities are that the Friends of Music, instead of being a distinguished society devoted to the revelation of neglected art works, will become a commonplace choral body compelled to deal in the wares of Handel and possibly Elgar.

The state of choral music in the United States is at present not clearly defined. In the large cities it has no very firm hold on the public because of the continual excitement of attention by the conjurings of orchestral wizards and the technical exhibitions of distinguished solo performers. Fortunately a few organizations persist in good works. The Oratorio Society of New York, for instance, sustains life by its annual performances of The Messiah and gathers enough funds for two other concerts. At the last of this season it gave Judas Maccabeus, which had enjoyed a long rest. In the same week the Society of the Friends of Music presented Samson. It had shortly before given The Creation. The Schola Cantorum invites attention to concerts of short choral numbers and its programmes are decidedly less interesting than they were a few seasons back. This organization is providing a chorus for the Ninth Symphony at the final concert of the Boston Orchestra. In Cincinnati and some other cities choral festivals are held once a year, and in some of the smaller cities choral music has to take the place of orchestral, which is too expensive for these communities. No choral composition of even minor importance has been produced by any American composer of late. The country lacks the stimulus of such institutions as the festival of the Three Choirs in England. The American composer is persuaded that he can earn a better living by writing songs than by attempting the difficulties of choral music.

The Oxford University Press has done some good work by creating the Bach Cantata Club, which gives concerts of Bach music in churches. Some of these concerts have been stimulating, but some have missed the aim of the movement. They have been instrumental and vocal solo concerts, and little is accomplished by them. But British music and musicians are not neglected here. Harold Samuel continues to play Bach to large audiences, and the London String Quartet, which recently returned, was cordially welcomed. H. Waldo Warner's "Suite in the Olden Style" was played and approvingly received. The English Singers come season after season and they have done much to enlighten this country about the great English part-song writers.

It must appear, then, that the present state of music in the United States is not settled. The elder composers, who pursued the classic ideals even in their romantic endeavours, have passed into comparative obscurity. Their works are rarely heard by a public insatiable in its demand for new excitements. The popular writers cater for the taste of the masses who have no interest in musical art. The young intellectuals are chasing the Gallic will-o'-the-wisp and striving to light their farthing rushlights in the evasive flames of Honegger and Milhaud, who are in their turn borrowing illumination from Stravinsky and Schönberg. There is no native conception of opera; the public mind cannot associate that form of art with its own thought, but habitually regards it as an exotic.

There is no cause for wonder that the United States feeds its musical appetite on imported food. Every famous musician in the world comes here at one time or another, and the public sits up and waits for the next celebrity to arrive on an incoming steamer. We have the best orchestras in the world, and sometimes they play American music, but the audiences are more interested in the conductors' readings of Brahms and Beethoven and in performances of familiar concertos.

Much effort is expended toward the betterment of conditions, but most of it takes the form of offers of prizes. So far no prize composition has got the start of the world. Possibly when the general state of the public mind becomes more settled and intellectual dignity recaptures the respect of the people some vital music may be produced. But at present there is nothing of indubitable immortality in sight.

(Concluded)

* Mr. Henderson's first article appeared in The Times on Saturday, October 26.

The Broadcasting Programmes for to-day and to-morrow and Broadcasting Notes will be found on page 8

TOWNSMAN REPORTER INTERVIEWS KOUSSEVITZKY

The Boston Symphony gave its sixth concert on Wednesday evening in Alumnae Hall, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, veteran conductor and Chevalier of the Legion of Honor. In the intermission Dr. Koussevitzky was kind enough to grant the TOWNSMAN reporter an interview.

Our conversation, which was in French, due to Dr. Koussevitzky's shyness in speaking the less familiar English, took place in a tiny dressing room in the back of the hall. The conductor, tall and courtly and cosmopolitan, at once put me at my ease, because of his charming and warm-hearted smile. I asked him how he liked to play at Wellesley.

"It is enchanting," he cried, "to play in a college town. The whole audience is full of the spirit of youth. One feels it also in Northhampton, at Smith. One can play all music for a college audience—old, new, classical, modern. They are interested in everything."

"How do you find Boston as a 'symphony city'?" I asked him.

"Splendid. The people of Boston have watched the growth of our symphony for fifty years. They appreciate everything. One can play much more new music in Boston than in New York. This winter I plan to give something new at almost every concert, some things for the first time in Boston, some things for the first time in America. It will be very interesting, I hope."

Finally, I inquired about his plans for the summer. He told me that he might spend several weeks here conducting the Massachusetts Music Festival, before going to Europe. Massachusetts must be sensible of the high honor paid to it by the presence of this distinguished conductor.

As the bell rang for the beginning of the second part of the concert, Dr. Koussevitzky bowed a stately bow, smiled a charming smile and said "Good-bye" with a friendly handshake and nod.

WELLESLEY LOCAL

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

THIS CLIPPING FROM

DEC

MUSIC OF THE HILLS

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

MR. NIKOLAI SOKOLOFF, who will give a concert with his Cleveland Orchestra next Tuesday evening at Carnegie Hall, has never within our recollection presented an uninteresting program—indeed, he is one of the best four orchestral program-makers in America (the others are Messrs. Koussevitzky, Stokowski and Reiner). Mr. Sokoloff's list for his concert of December 3 is even more interesting than usual. Not only does it contain three promising novelties, concerning which at the moment we cannot speak from personal experience, but it offers a revival of one of these

THIS CLIPPING FROM

DEC

A Boston contemporary exclaims that, contrary to general belief, it now appears that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not the "second oldest" in the United States, exceeded in honorable years only by the Philharmonic Society of New York. To the St. Louis Orchestra belongs that distinction; the current musical year is its Jubilee Year; in so many words it affirms the title in a program book:

With these opening concerts the St. Louis Symphony Society swings into the second half-century of its career. Few realize that since the disappearance a year ago of the New York Symphony Society, it is the second oldest in this country, outranked in this respect only by the New York Philharmonic Society, organized in 1842. It is older than the Boston Symphony Orchestra by a year; than the Chicago Orchestra by fourteen years; than the Philadelphia Orchestra by twenty-three years; than the Minneapolis Orchestra by the same number. All the other symphony orchestras are, compared with it, mere fledglings.

FLORENCE FRENCH
EDITOR AND PUBLISHER

MUSICAL LEADER

E. F. SMITH
J. DEMERATH
F. M. WARD

TELEPHONE { 4839 HARRISON { 5408
CABLE ADDRESS: MUSICLEAD CHICAGO

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

SUBSCRIPTION: $3.00 FOR YEAR
CANADIAN $4.00 FOR YEAR
FOREIGN $4.50 FOR YEAR

CHICAGO.

501 McCORMICK BUILDING
332 SO. MICHIGAN AVE.

DEC 2 1929

YOUR ATTENTION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH APPEARED IN LAST THURSDAY'S ISSUE OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

Koussevitzky Plays Gruenberg's Work

On Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid the first of its five annual visits to New York. Serge Koussevitzky conducted two programs which aroused the enthusiasm of capacity audiences in Carnegie Hall, including many standees. On Thursday evening the famous Rusisan conductor offered no novelties, but gave a most beautiful and well-balanced performance of the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven which, strange as it may seem, was heard for the first time this season in New York. Preceding this were Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture, Ravel's exquisite score "Ma Mère l'Oye" and Strauss' ever fascinating "Til Eulenspiegel."

Much interest in the Saturday afternoon program was centered in Louis Gruenberg's "The Enchanted Isle." The symphonic poem, heard for the first time in New York, aroused much enthusiasm and Koussevitzky brought the composer on the stage to acknowledge the spontaneous and insistent applause. Composed ten years ago, the work came as a surprise to those who expected an ultra-modern expression from one of our recognized leaders in the contemporary movement. Those who know his "Daniel Jazz," "The Creation," "Jazz Suite" and "Vagabondia" had opportunity to see that Gruenberg had developed naturally and spontaneously with the spirit of the times, but that his art, technic and knowledge are deeply rooted in the traditions of the past. No one who heard "The Enchanted Isle" could doubt the creative ability and skill of its composer. It pays tribute to romanticism and impressionism and is set forth in clear, definite form with an orchestration which reflects mastery, penetrating study and great natural gifts. It is a work of which America may well be proud for it shows a knowledge of music in every form and genuine musicianship, the most important foundation upon which to build ultra-modernism. It was played with devotion and exquisite care of details.

Koussevitzky opened the concert with a subtle performance of Handel's Concerto Grosso for strings, opus 6, No. 10, in which he displayed a high degree of artistic restraint. The program closed with an electrifying performance of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony. As the famous Russian conductor, Wassily Safonoff, said of his own performance of the same work, 'Scratch a Cossack and you find the Tartar!" Koussevitzky's performance had all the fire, contrasting moods and enthusiasm with which only a Russian could invest the work.

Entertainments

MUSICAL LIFE IN AMERICA

II.—IMPORTATION OF CELEBRITIES

(By W. J. Henderson)

The United States contains three cities which maintain seasons of opera—New York, Chicago, and Philadelphia. In the metropolis there is much dissatisfaction with the offerings of the impresario. He has been more successful with revivals than with novelties. Rosa Ponselle in Norma aroused the town. Richard Strauss's Die Aegyptische Helena, Respighi's La Campana Sommersa, Ernest Krenek's Jonny spielt auf and Pizzetti's Fra Gherardo were all lamentable failures. The famous jazz opera, which so excited Germany and which was pronounced a masterpiece by a jazz expert living in Leipzig, was declared by the New York commentators to be sorry stuff and its jazz as little like the real thing as a hawk is like a handsaw. No new American opera was produced. Deems Taylor's The King's Henchman remained perforce in the repertory; his second work is not yet written.

But opera bears no very close relation to the real musical life of the United States. Orchestral concerts and appearances of celebrated vocal and instrumental virtuosi seem to interest the people more. The orchestral situation in New York remains uncertain. The Philharmonic Society is supported by persons of wealth; it does not earn profits. No orchestra can do that, because a public demand for famous conductors has been created and their salaries are so enormous that deficits are inevitable. The Philadelphia Orchestra and the Boston Symphony give series of concerts in New York every season and the latter, which has not suffered from guest conductors but has constantly been under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, may now be regarded as the foremost instrumental organization in the east. Only a small amount of native music is produced by these orchestras, partly because the public has been taught to focus its attention on novel readings of old works by visiting conductors and partly because there is no American composer of important music at present.

The Society of the Friends of Music, which has for years given concerts of unusual character, purposes to widen its field next season by leaving the intimate seclusion of the Town Hall and going to more spacious accommodation in Carnegie Hall. An independent orchestra is later to be organized with Artur Bodanzky, who has resigned from the Opera, as conductor. The probabilities are that the Friends of Music, instead of being a distinguished society devoted to the revelation of neglected art works, will become a commonplace choral body compelled to deal in the wares of Handel and possibly Elgar.

The state of choral music in the United States is at present not clearly defined. In the large cities it has no very firm hold on the public because of the continual excitement of attention by the conjurings of orchestral wizards and the technical exhibitions of distinguished solo performers. Fortunately a few organizations persist in good works. The Oratorio Society of New York, for instance, sustains life by its annual performances of The Messiah and gathers enough funds for two other concerts. At the last of this season it gave Judas Maccabeus, which had enjoyed a long rest. In the same week the Society of the Friends of Music presented Samson. It had shortly before given The Creation. The Schola Cantorum invites attention to concerts of short choral numbers and its programmes are decidedly less interesting than they were a few seasons back. This organization is providing a chorus for the Ninth Symphony at the final concert of the Boston Orchestra. In Cincinnati and some other cities choral festivals are held once a year, and in some of the smaller cities choral music has to take the place of orchestral, which is too expensive for these communities. No choral composition of even minor importance has been produced by any American composer of late. The country lacks the stimulus of such institutions as the festival of the Three Choirs in England. The American composer is persuaded that he can earn a better living by writing songs than by attempting the difficulties of choral music.

The Oxford University Press has done some good work by creating the Bach Cantata Club, which gives concerts of Bach music in churches. Some of these concerts have been stimulating, but some have missed the aim of the movement. They have been instrumental and vocal solo concerts, and little is accomplished by them. But British music and musicians are not neglected here. Harold Samual continues to play Bach to large

TOWNSMAN REPORTER INTERVIEWS KOUSSEVITZKY

The Boston Symphony gave its sixth concert on Wednesday evening in Alumnae Hall, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, veteran conductor and Chevalier of the Legion of Honor. In the intermission Dr. Koussevitzky was kind enough to grant the TOWNSMAN reporter an interview.

Our conversation, which was in French, due to Dr. Koussevitzky's shyness in speaking the less familiar English, took place in a tiny dressing room in the back of the hall. The conductor, tall and courtly and cosmopolitan, at once put me at my ease, because of his charming and warm-hearted smile. I asked him how he liked to play at Wellesley.

"It is enchanting," he cried, "to play in a college town. The whole audience is full of the spirit of youth. One feels it also in Northhampton, at Smith. One can play all music for a college audience—old, new, classical, modern. They are interested in everything."

"How do you find Boston as a 'symphony city'?" I asked him.

"Splendid. The people of Boston have watched the growth of our symphony for fifty years. They appreciate everything. One can play much more new music in Boston than in New York. This winter I plan to give something new at almost every concert, some things for the first time in Boston, some things for the first time in America. It will be very interesting, I hope."

Finally, I inquired about his plans for the summer. He told me that he might spend several weeks here conducting the Massachusetts Music Festival, before going to Europe. Massachusetts must be sensible of the high honor paid to it by the presence of this distinguished conductor.

As the bell rang for the beginning of the second part of the concert, Dr. Koussevitzky bowed a stately bow, smiled a charming smile and said "Good-bye" with a friendly handshake and nod.

WELLESLEY LOCAL

FLORENCE FRENCH
EDITOR AND PUBLISHER

MUSICAL LEADER

E. F. SMITH
J. DEMERATH
F. M. WARD

TELEPHONE { 4839 HARRISON 5408
CABLE ADDRESS MUSICLEAD CHICAGO

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

SUBSCRIPTION $3.00 FOR YEAR
CANADIAN $4.00 FOR YEAR
FOREIGN $4.50 FOR YEAR

CHICAGO.

501 McCORMICK BUILDING
332 SO. MICHIGAN AVE.

DEC 2 1920

YOUR ATTENTION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH APPEARED IN LAST THURSDAY'S ISSUE OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

Koussevitzky Plays Gruenberg's Work

On Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid the first of its five annual visits to New York. Serge Koussevitzky conducted two programs which aroused the enthusiasm of capacity audiences in Carnegie Hall, including many standees. On Thursday evening the famous Rusisan conductor offered no novelties, but gave a most beautiful and well-balanced performance of the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven which, strange as it may seem, was heard for the first time this season in New York. Preceding this were Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture, Ravel's exquisite score "Ma Mère l'Oye" and Strauss' ever fascinating "Til Eulenspiegel."

Much interest in the Saturday afternoon program was centered in Louis Gruenberg's "The Enchanted Isle." The symphonic poem, heard for the first time in New York, aroused much enthusiasm and Koussevitzky brought the composer on the stage to acknowledge the spontaneous and insistent applause. Composed ten years ago, the work came as a surprise to those who expected an ultra-modern expression from one of our recognized leaders in the contemporary movement. Those who know his "Daniel Jazz," "The Creation," "Jazz Suite" and "Vagabondia" had opportunity to see that Gruenberg had developed naturally and spontaneously with the spirit of the times, but that his art, technic and knowledge are deeply rooted in the traditions of the past. No one who heard "The Enchanted Isle" could doubt the creative ability and skill of its composer. It pays tribute to romanticism and impressionism and is set forth in clear, definite form with an orchestration which reflects mastery, penetrating study and great natural gifts. It is a work of which America may well be proud for it shows a knowledge of music in every form and genuine musicianship, the most important foundation upon which to build ultra-modernism. It was played with devotion and exquisite care of details.

Koussevitzky opened the concert with a subtle performance of Handel's Concerto Grosso for strings, opus 6, No. 10, in which he displayed a high degree of artistic restraint. The program closed with an electrifying performance of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony. As the famous Russian conductor, Wassily Safonoff, said of his own performance of the same work, 'Scratch a Cossack and you find the Tartar!" Koussevitzky's performance had all the fire, contrasting moods and enthusiasm with which only a Russian could invest the work.

virtuosi seem to interest the people more. The orchestral situation in New York remains uncertain. The Philharmonic Society is supported by persons of wealth; it does not earn profits. No orchestra can do that, because a public demand for famous conductors has been created and their salaries are so enormous that deficits are inevitable. The Philadelphia Orchestra and the Boston Symphony give series of concerts in New York every season and the latter, which has not suffered from guest conductors but has constantly been under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, may now be regarded as the foremost instrumental organization in the east. Only a small amount of native music is produced by these orchestras, partly because the public has been taught to focus its attention on novel readings of old works by visiting conductors and partly because there is no American composer of important music at present.

The Society of the Friends of Music, which has for years given concerts of unusual character, purposes to widen its field next season by leaving the intimate seclusion of the Town Hall and going to more spacious accommodation in Carnegie Hall. An independent orchestra is later to be organized with Artur Bodanzky, who has resigned from the Opera, as conductor. The probabilities are that the Friends of Music, instead of being a distinguished society devoted to the revelation of neglected art works, will become a commonplace choral body compelled to deal in the wares of Handel and possibly Elgar.

The state of choral music in the United States is at present not clearly defined. In the large cities it has no very firm hold on the public because of the continual excitement of attention by the conjurings of orchestral wizards and the technical exhibitions of distinguished solo performers. Fortunately a few organizations persist in good works. The Oratorio Society of New York, for instance, sustains life by its annual performances of The Messiah and gathers enough funds for two other concerts. At the last of this season it gave Judas Maccabeus, which had enjoyed a long rest. In the same week the Society of the Friends of Music presented Samson. It had shortly before given The Creation. The Schola Cantorum invites attention to concerts of short choral numbers and its programmes are decidedly less interesting than they were a few seasons back. This organization is providing a chorus for the Ninth Symphony at the final concert of the Boston Orchestra. In Cincinnati and some other cities choral festivals are held once a year, and in some of the smaller cities choral music has to take the place of orchestral, which is too expensive for these communities. No choral composition of even minor importance has been produced by any American composer of late. The country lacks the stimulus of such institutions as the festival of the Three Choirs in England. The American composer is persuaded that he can earn a better living by writing songs than by attempting the difficulties of choral music.

The Oxford University Press has done some good work by creating the Bach Cantata Club, which gives concerts of Bach music in churches. Some of these concerts have been stimulating, but some have missed the aim of the movement. They have been instrumental and vocal solo concerts, and little is accomplished by them. But British music and musicians are not neglected here. Harold Samuel continues to play Bach to large audiences, and the London String Quartet, which recently returned, was cordially welcomed. H. Waldo Warner's "Suite in the Olden Style" was played and approvingly received. The English Singers come season after season and they have done much to enlighten this country about the great English part-song writers.

It must appear, then, that the present state of music in the United States is not settled. The elder composers, who pursued the classic ideals even in their romantic endeavours, have passed into comparative obscurity. Their works are rarely heard by a public insatiable in its demand for new excitements. The popular writers cater for the taste of the masses who have no interest in musical art. The young intellectuals are chasing the Gallic will-o'-the-wisp and striving to light their farthing rushlights in the evasive flames of Honegger and Milhaud, who are in their turn borrowing illumination from Stravinsky and Schönberg. There is no native conception of opera; the public mind cannot associate that form of art with its own thought, but habitually regards it as an exotic.

There is no cause for wonder that the United States feeds its musical appetite on imported food. Every famous musician in the world comes here at one time or another, and the public sits up and waits for the next celebrity to arrive on an incoming steamer. We have the best orchestras in the world, and sometimes they play American music, but the audiences are more interested in the conductors' readings of Brahms and Beethoven and in performances of familiar concertos.

Much effort is expended toward the betterment of conditions, but most of it takes the form of offers of prizes. So far no prize composition has got the start of the world. Possibly when the general state of the public mind becomes more settled and intellectual dignity recaptures the respect of the people some vital music may be produced. But at present there is nothing of indubitable immortality in sight.

(Concluded)

Mr. Henderson's first article appeared in The Times on Saturday, October 26.

The Broadcasting Programmes for to-day and to-morrow and Broadcasting Notes will be found on page 8 room in the back of the hall. The conductor, tall and courtly and cosmopolitan, at once put me at my ease, because of his charming and warm-hearted smile. I asked him how he liked to play at Wellesley.

"It is enchanting," he cried, "to play in a college town. The whole audience is full of the spirit of youth. One feels it also in Northhampton, at Smith. One can play all music for a college audience—old, new, classical, modern. They are interested in everything."

"How do you find Boston as a 'symphony city'?" I asked him.

"Splendid. The people of Boston have watched the growth of our symphony for fifty years. They appreciate everything. One can play much more new music in Boston than in New York. This winter I plan to give something new at almost every concert, some things for the first time in Boston, some things for the first time in America. It will be very interesting, I hope."

Finally, I inquired about his plans for the summer. He told me that he might spend several weeks here conducting the Massachusetts Music Festival, before going to Europe. Massachusetts must be sensible of the high honor paid to it by the presence of this distinguished conductor.

As the bell rang for the beginning of the second part of the concert, Dr. Koussevitzky bowed a stately bow, smiled a charming smile and said "Good-bye" with a friendly handshake and nod.

WELLESLEY LOCAL

NOV 17 1929

192 — NEW YORK CRITICISMS —

KOUSSEVITZKY'S VIEWS ON INDIVIDUAL INTERPRETATION

The following article represents a part of an address, "Concerning Interpretation," written by Serge Koussevitzky when the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra received the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws from Harvard University on June 20, 1929. The musician discusses the manifold considerations which affect musical interpretation through the individuality of the performer or leader.

As an auxiliary art, interpretation is, above all, most closely connected with music. Interpretation manifests itself in two directions. On one side it serves as a link, becomes the intermediary step between hearer and author. Its most important aim here is the creation of a contact between author and public. In this direction interpretation only then reaches its goal when it produces a real, living contact, when it becomes that vehicle through which the esthetic value established by the author is transmitted to the public directly and with a greater power. The greater receptivity the interpretation arouses in its listeners the more perfect will it be. The power of conviction will dominate in the struggle and victory over indifference, and passive receptivity peculiar to the public, generally formed of a casual assembly of people of heterogeneous culture, different tastes and artistic habits.

***

Good interpretation leads the public to one denominator, seeming to make homogeneous the mixed crowd, bringing it to one level of receptivity. The impression is that the mass is transformed into one single listener. The first instant of contact created by the good interpreter is the moment of smoothing, of bringing the listeners' minds to some single artistic level. It is the gathering of all the heterogeneity and motley of artistic tastes into one focus, which in this meaning resembles the interpreter himself. If that aim is not immediately reached, one must consider the interpretation to have failed, and all that follows later is destined also to failure—the contact cannot arise.

The performance will go in one direction. The listeners' receptivity, instead of yearning toward unity, will diverge more and more from the interpretation and will be scattered in the audience itself, provoking, at last, a complete discordance between interpreter and audience. What is called mutual misunderstanding will then happen. The reason is not at all in the fact that the performed music or the interpreter is bad. The cause is quite different: it is the absence of a will in the interpreter, the absence of that power which urges the public to submit itself willingly, or even unwillingly, if this is necessary. The performed work may be excellent, but the contact does not arise if the will of interpretation is absent in the interpreter. And the inverse: the performed piece may be of a low artistic quality, but if the interpreter's will is obvious the contact with the listeners will arise in any circumstance.

***

The matter of second moment in interpretation is the attraction toward the interpreter of the listeners brought to one level of receptivity. This attraction must increase with such strength that, in the end, it has brought the hearer to a complete subordination. If this complete subordination is reached, it gives birth to what is called an immediate receptivity, which overcomes both satiety and indifference and even the peculiar, professional feeling—that is, puts the listeners into an immediate contact with living music and its expression. This is the interpreter's great victory—creating such receptivity on the part of the audience. Then happens the "awakening"—the listener trying to return to his customary state. If this is easy for him the whole matter is concluded; if the return to the previous state becomes difficult, sometimes quite impossible, then a very important thing has happened. Awaking from his musical sleep, the listener faces reality, which takes a new shape, an unusual one. As if the world had partly changed, life possesses a new value. A spiritual enrichment has taken place. For the interpreter this is the highest reward, the highest step to which interpretation may ascend.

When speaking of interpretation in this direction, we mentioned the listener's willing and unwilling submission. The willing submission arises when the interpreter creates a contact between hearer and author, in conditions habitual to the listeners—this means when the interpreter's performance of a work does not contradict the opinion which the listener has already formed about it.

***

The forcible submission occurs when the contact arises not between author and public but between the public and the interpreter himself independently of the author and against the public's will, in unusual conditions, when the performance is quite new to the audience, when all the traditions referring to the performance of this work are broken. The forcible submission is, of course, the most difficult. This is individual interpretation, in distinction to the first, which we may consider as objective. Had one to settle the question in favor of one of them (a matter of principle and convictions), one would, of course, vote for a bright, powerful, individual interpretation rather than for a weak, helpless, objective one.

Interpretation is not an art by itself, but an auxiliary one, greatly dependent on the general conditions of musical creation in this or that epoch. What we consider a stylistic performance is the link between musical performance and musical creation, this link being determined in relation to some definite epoch. A stylistic performance, of any quality, can always be only more or less precise. There is no solid basis to the argument that this or that style of our period coincides with previous performances. It is always a matter of guesswork and conventions. The quality of a stylistic performance always depends not so much on traditions as on the sagacity and culture of the interpreter himself.

***

A good interpreter commands not only the styles of different epochs but also the composer's styles of one period. At the same time he does not copy anything at all. An interpreter, who possesses a style of his own, creates his performance by uniting past traditions in the shape they reached us with the technics of our time. Neither Bach's nor Beethoven's tempi and dynamics are in accordance with our tempi and dynamics, and to copy servilely the previous performance would mean to retard modernity forcibly and artificially, achieving only dullness; for it is not possible to turn life backward. In a performance of classical works, seeming sometimes free, the departure from the past serves more to transmit the character and meaning of the work than a servile imitation of this past. To speak the truth, one must consider interpretation a very young art (in the sense of orchestral conducting). It was born at the end of the nineteenth century and really flourished only in our time. It is a mistake to think that the great conductors of the past were better than the contemporary ones. There is much more solid ground to suppose that such excellent conductors of the nineteenth century as Hans von Bülow or Hector Berlioz would be unable to do anything with the modern orchestra and modern music. Their technics are indivisibly connected with the romantic period, and in our time they would be weak, helpless, just as some winner at a London Derby in the nineteenth century, were he even the most marvelous jockey of his time, would not be able to use an airplane instead of his horse and replace Lindbergh.

If in Wagner's and Berlioz's time the technics of orchestral conducting were not clear, in such measure as it was then possible to contest the independent part played by a conductor, now these technics of orchestral conducting have reached such fruition that they may, with justice, be considered an independent musical science. Wagner and Berlioz, had one to judge by the testimony of their contemporaries, were excellent conductors; but both, trying to confine to a definite theory the technics of orchestral conducting, would write only a few pages about it. Now the development of these technics, and their explanation, would need the writing of great scientific and theoretical works. The technics of a modern conductor are not less complicated and precise than the technics of a modern virtuoso, and the quality of orchestral playing does not depend any less on the fingers, wrist and hand of the conductor than a violinist or a pianist depends on his instrument. The art of a virtuoso is in the submission to himself only of one instrument on which he plays, and in his union with it. The conductor's technics are not connected immediately with the instruments, but with two groups of living men, toward whom his will is directed. His art is to transform the first group into one vibrating instrument, sounding as if he played on it, not conventionally, but with his own hands and fingers; and the second group, which is the public, the conductor yearns to change into one listener. Thus, in the form in which it now exists, interpretation is a new kind of art. It is a product of our time, appearing to be one of the achievements of the twentieth century. The conductor's creation, today, is an offering to the treasury of spiritual values of mankind, on an equal basis with the work of the scientist, the architect and the painter-creator. The musician interpreter causes the fusion of all the manifestations of the modern man's activity, out of which modern culture is built. Being a painter, he is at the same time an organizer and an educator in the world of the beautiful. He belongs to those happy promoters of mankind who help to vanquish everyday gray existence, lifting it to the ideals toward which life tends.

FAMILY TRAITS IN MUSIC.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I am enclosing a clipping from The Philadelphia Public Ledger that so succinctly expresses the thoughts of those on one side of the modern music controversy that I felt sure it would interest you:

"The concertgoer who walks out on Prokofieff and Scriabin had a father who disliked Richard Strauss, a grandfather who hooted Wagner, and a great-grandfather who thought Beethoven a revolutionist."—Edwin Stanley Thompson, Bristol, Pa.

MIRIAM K. HUEBER.

Philadelphia, Nov. 7, 1929.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
NOV 14

The advent of the Boston Symphony next week reminds us of a story concerning Mr. Koussevitsky's visit to the recent Worcester Festival. Rain poured in torrents when he and Mr. Gruenberg set out for the festival hall. Two others were in the party, and the four piled into a cab. Firmly embedded in a traffic jam, the taxi waited, while rain drummed on the windows and Mr. Koussevitzky fidgeted. He harrangued in French upon the general disintegration of French orchestras, raved in German about Richard Strauss and protested in Russian to the Irish driver. Finally, as they descended at the door, he and Mr. Gruenberg argued in Italian as to who should pay the fare. Later that evening, at supper, the conductor discussed literature and painting in English.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAM

Conductor Honored.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give its first New York concerts of the season next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, has been twice honored with a doctor's degree during his sojourn in America. Harvard made him an LL.D. last June and Brown previously had conferred on him a doctorate.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING SUN

Events in Music

Next Thursday evening at 8:30 and Saturday afternoon at 2:30, in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its New York season. This is the forty-ninth season of the orchestra and the sixth under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, who will present on Thursday evening Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor. For the matinee program a new score will be "The Enchanted Isle," a symphonic poem by Louis Gruenberg. The program will open with Handel's Concerto G[illegible] for string orchestra, [illegible] close with Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony No. 6 in B Minor.

Gruenberg's "Enchanted Isle" had its first performance at the Worcester festival this season and was introduced here by Mr. Koussevitsky in Boston on Nov. 8 and 9. The composer divulges that this is one of a series of four tone poems conceived during the World War period, but recently scored. Gruenberg, a native of Russia, now lives in Brooklyn. He is particularly known by his "Daniel Jazz." Other works, "Creation" and "Jazz Suite," are announced for early performance in this country.

* * *

The Philadelphia Orchestra, under the direction of Leopold Stokowski, will give its second concert in the New York series at Carnegie Hall Tuesday evening at 8.45. The program consists of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony (No. 3—E flat); Deems Taylor's "Jurgen," and Edward Elgar's Variations on an Original Theme ("Enigma").

As heretofore, the doors will be closed after the beginning of the concert until the intermission, and after the interval of the concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD
NOV 17

Koussevitzky Brings New Score

Louis Gruenberg's Poem, "The Enchanted Isle" Comes Thursday

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its New York season next Thursday evening at 8.30 and Saturday afternoon at 2.30 in Carnegie Hall. This is the forty-ninth season of the orchestra and the sixth under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The Boston Symphony Orchestra retains to a man its personnel of last season.

Mr. Koussevitzky will present Thursday evening Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite, Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C Minor. For the matinee program a new score will be "The Enchanted Isle," a symphonic poem by Louis Gruenberg. The program will open with Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 10, and close with Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony No. 6 in B Minor.

Gruenberg's "Enchanted Isle" had its first performance at the Worcester festival this season and was introduced here by Mr. Koussevitsky in Boston on Nov. 8 and 9. The composer divulges that this is one of a series of four tone poems conceived during the World War period, but recently scored. Gruenberg, a native of Russia, now lives in Brooklyn. He is particularly known by his "Daniel Jazz." Other works, "Creation" and "Jazz Suite," are announced for early performance in this country.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who leads the first concert of the New York series Thursday evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will visit New York for the first time this season this week, playing at Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon and at the Brooklyn Academy Friday evening. On Thursday Dr. Koussevitzky offers familiar numbers; on Saturday he will give the first New York performance of Louis Greunberg's symphonic poem, "The Enchanted Isle," whose publication has been underwritten by the Juilliard Foundation.

The work is one of four tone poems whose inspiration dates back to the war period, but which were scored more recently. "The Enchanted Isle" won the second prize in the American zone in the 1928 Schubert centennial contest, and was first played last month at the Worcester Festival under Albert Stoessel. Dr. Koussevitzky first gave it in Boston on November 8 and 9.

NOV 17 1929

192 — NEW YORK CRITICISMS —

KOUSSEVITZKY'S VIEWS ON INDIVIDUAL INTERPRETATION

The following article represents a part of an address, "Concerning Interpretation," written by Serge Koussevitzky when the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra received the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws from Harvard University on June 20, 1929. The musician discusses the manifold considerations which affect musical interpretation through the individuality of the performer or leader.

As an auxiliary art, interpretation is, above all, most closely connected with music. Interpretation manifests itself in two directions. On one side it serves as a link, becomes the intermediary step between hearer and author. Its most important aim here is the creation of a contact between author and public. In this direction interpretation only then reaches its goal when it produces a real, living contact, when it becomes that vehicle through which the esthetic value established by the author is transmitted to the public directly and with a greater power. The greater receptivity the interpretation arouses in its listeners the more perfect will it be. The power of conviction will dominate in the struggle and victory over indifference, and passive receptivity peculiar to the public, generally formed of a casual assembly of people of heterogeneous culture, different tastes and artistic habits.

***

Good interpretation leads the public to one denominator, seeming to make homogeneous the mixed crowd, bringing it to one level of receptivity. The impression is that the mass is transformed into one single listener. The first instant of contact created by the good interpreter is the moment of smoothing, of bringing the listeners' minds to some single artistic level. It is the gathering of all the heterogeneity and motley of artistic tastes into one focus, which in this meaning resembles the interpreter himself. If that aim is not immediately reached, one must consider the interpretation to have failed, and all that follows later is destined also to failure—the contact cannot arise.

The performance will go in one direction. The listeners' receptivity, instead of yearning toward unity, will diverge more and more from the interpretation and will be scattered in the audience itself, provoking, at last, a complete discordance between interpreter and audience. What is called mutual misunderstanding will then happen. The reason is not at all in the fact that the performed music or the interpreter is bad. The cause is quite different: it is the absence of a will in the interpreter, the absence of that power which urges the public to submit itself willingly, or even unwillingly, if this is necessary. The performed work may be excellent, but the contact does not arise if the will of interpretation is absent in the interpreter. And the inverse: the performed piece may be of a low artistic quality, but if the interpreter's will is obvious the contact with the listeners will arise in any circumstance.

***

The matter of second moment in interpretation is the attraction toward the interpreter of the listeners brought to one level of receptivity. This attraction must increase with such strength that, in the end, it has brought the hearer to a complete subordination. If this complete subordination is reached, it gives birth to what is called an immediate receptivity, which overcomes both satiety and indifference and even the peculiar, professional feeling—that is, puts the listeners into an immediate contact with living music and its expression. This is the interpreter's great victory—creating such receptivity on the part of the audience. Then happens the "awakening"—the listener trying to return to his customary state. If this is easy for him the whole matter is concluded; if the return to the previous state becomes difficult, sometimes quite impossible, then a very important thing has happened. Awaking from his musical sleep, the listener faces reality, which takes a new shape, an unusual one. As if the world had partly changed, life possesses a new value. A spiritual enrichment has taken place. For the interpreter this is the highest reward, the highest step to which interpretation may ascend.

When speaking of interpretation in this direction, we mentioned the listener's willing and unwilling submission. The willing submission arises when the interpreter creates a contact between hearer and author, in conditions habitual to the listeners—this means when the interpreter's performance of a work does not contradict the opinion which the listener has already formed about it.

***

The forcible submission occurs when the contact arises not between author and public but between the public and the interpreter himself independently of the author and against the public's will, in unusual conditions, when the performance is quite new to the audience, when all the traditions referring to the performance of this work are broken. The forcible submission is, of course, the most difficult. This is individual interpretation, in distinction to the first, which we may consider as objective. Had one to settle the question in favor of one of them (a matter of principle and convictions), one would, of course, vote for a bright, powerful, individual interpretation rather than for a weak, helpless, objective one.

Interpretation is not an art by itself, but an auxiliary one, greatly dependent on the general conditions of musical creation in this or that epoch. What we consider a stylistic performance is the link between musical performance and musical creation, this link being determined in relation to some definite epoch. A stylistic performance, of any quality, can always be only more or less precise. There is no solid basis to the argument that this or that style of our period coincides with previous performances. It is always a matter of guesswork and conventions. The quality of a stylistic performance always depends not so much on traditions as on the sagacity and culture of the interpreter himself.

***

A good interpreter commands not only the styles of different epochs but also the composer's styles of one period. At the same time he does not copy anything at all. An interpreter, who possesses a style of his own, creates his performance by uniting past traditions in the shape they reached us with the technics of our time. Neither Bach's nor Beethoven's tempi and dynamics are in accordance with our tempi and dynamics, and to copy servilely the previous performance would mean to retard modernity forcibly and artificially, achieving only dullness; for it is not possible to turn life backward. In a performance of classical works, seeming sometimes free, the departure from the past serves more to transmit the character and meaning of the work than a servile imitation of this past. To speak the truth, one must consider interpretation a very young art (in the sense of orchestral conducting). It was born at the end of the nineteenth century and really flourished only in our time. It is a mistake to think that the great conductors of the past were better than the contemporary ones. There is much more solid ground to suppose that such excellent conductors of the nineteenth century as Hans von Bülow or Hector Berlioz would be unable to do anything with the modern orchestra and modern music. Their technics are indivisibly connected with the romantic period, and in our time they would be weak, helpless, just as some winner at a London Derby in the nineteenth century, were he even the most marvelous jockey of his time, would not be able to use an airplane instead of his horse and replace Lindbergh.

If in Wagner's and Berlioz's time the technics of orchestral conducting were not clear, in such measure as it was then possible to contest the independent part played by a conductor, now these technics of orchestral conducting have reached such fruition that they may, with justice, be considered an independent musical science. Wagner and Berlioz, had one to judge by the testimony of their contemporaries, were excellent conductors; but both, trying to confine to a definite theory the technics of orchestral conducting, would write only a few pages about it. Now the development of these technics, and their explanation, would need the writing of great scientific and theoretical works. The technics of a modern conductor are not less complicated and precise than the technics of a modern virtuoso, and the quality of orchestral playing does not depend any less on the fingers, wrist and hand of the conductor than a violinist or a pianist depends on his instrument. The art of a virtuoso is in the submission to himself only of one instrument on which he plays, and in his union with it. The conductor's technics are not connected immediately with the instruments, but with two groups of living men, toward whom his will is directed. His art is to transform the first group into one vibrating instrument, sounding as if he played on it, not conventionally, but with his own hands and fingers; and the second group, which is the public, the conductor yearns to change into one listener. Thus, in the form in which it now exists, interpretation is a new kind of art. It is a product of our time, appearing to be one of the achievements of the twentieth century. The conductor's creation, today, is an offering to the treasury of spiritual values of mankind, on an equal basis with the work of the scientist, the architect and the painter-creator. The musician interpreter causes the fusion of all the manifestations of the modern man's activity, out of which modern culture is built. Being a painter, he is at the same time an organizer and an educator in the world of the beautiful. He belongs to those happy promoters of mankind who help to vanquish everyday gray existence, lifting it to the ideals toward which life tends.

FAMILY TRAITS IN MUSIC.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I am enclosing a clipping from The Philadelphia Public Ledger that so succinctly expresses the thoughts of those on one side of the modern music controversy that I felt sure it would interest you:

"The concertgoer who walks out on Prokofieff and Scriabin had a father who disliked Richard Strauss, a grandfather who hooted Wagner, and a great-grandfather who thought Beethoven a revolutionist."—Edwin Stanley Thompson, Bristol, Pa.

MIRIAM K. HUEBER.

Philadelphia, Nov. 7, 1929.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

NOV 14

The advent of the Boston Symphony next week reminds us of a story concerning Mr. Koussevitsky's visit to the recent Worcester Festival. Rain poured in torrents when he and Mr. Gruenberg set out for the festival hall. Two others were in the party, and the four piled into a cab. Firmly embedded in a traffic jam, the taxi waited, while rain drummed on the windows and Mr. Koussevitzky fidgeted. He harrangued in French upon the general disintegration of French orchestras, raved in German about Richard Strauss and protested in Russian to the Irish driver. Finally, as they descended at the door, he and Mr. Gruenberg argued in Italian as to who should pay the fare. Later that evening, at supper, the conductor discussed literature and painting in English.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAM

Conductor Honored.

Serge Koussevitsky, Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give its first New York concerts of the season next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, has been twice honored with a doctor's degree during his sojourn in America. Harvard made him an LL.D. last June and Brown previously had conferred on him a doctorate.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING SUN

Events in Music

Next Thursday evening at 8:30 and Saturday afternoon at 2:30, in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its New York season. This is the forty-ninth season of the orchestra and the sixth under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, who will present on Thursday evening Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor. For the matinee program a new score will be "The Enchanted Isle," a symphonic poem by Louis Gruenberg. The program will open with Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra, op. 6, No. 10, and close with Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD

NOV 17

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Koussevitzky Brings New Score

Louis Gruenberg's Poem, "The Enchanted Isle" Comes Thursday

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who leads the first concert of the New York series Thursday evening.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its New York season next Thursday evening at 8.30 and Saturday afternoon at 2.30 in Carnegie Hall. This is the forty-ninth season of the orchestra and the sixth under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The Boston Symphony Orchestra retains to a man its personnel of last season.

Mr. Koussevitzky will present Thursday evening Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite, Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C Minor. For the matinee program a new score will be "The Enchanted Isle," a symphonic poem by Louis Gruenberg. The program will open with Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra, Opus 6, No. 10, and close with Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony No. 6 in B Minor.

Gruenberg's "Enchanted Isle" had its first performance at the Worcester festival this season and was introduced by Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston on Nov. 8 and 9. The composer divulges that this is one of a series of four tone poems conceived during the World War period, but recently scored. Gruenberg, a native of Russia, now lives in Brooklyn. He is particularly known by his "Daniel Jazz." Other works, "Creation" and "Jazz Suite" are announced for early performance in this country.

* * *

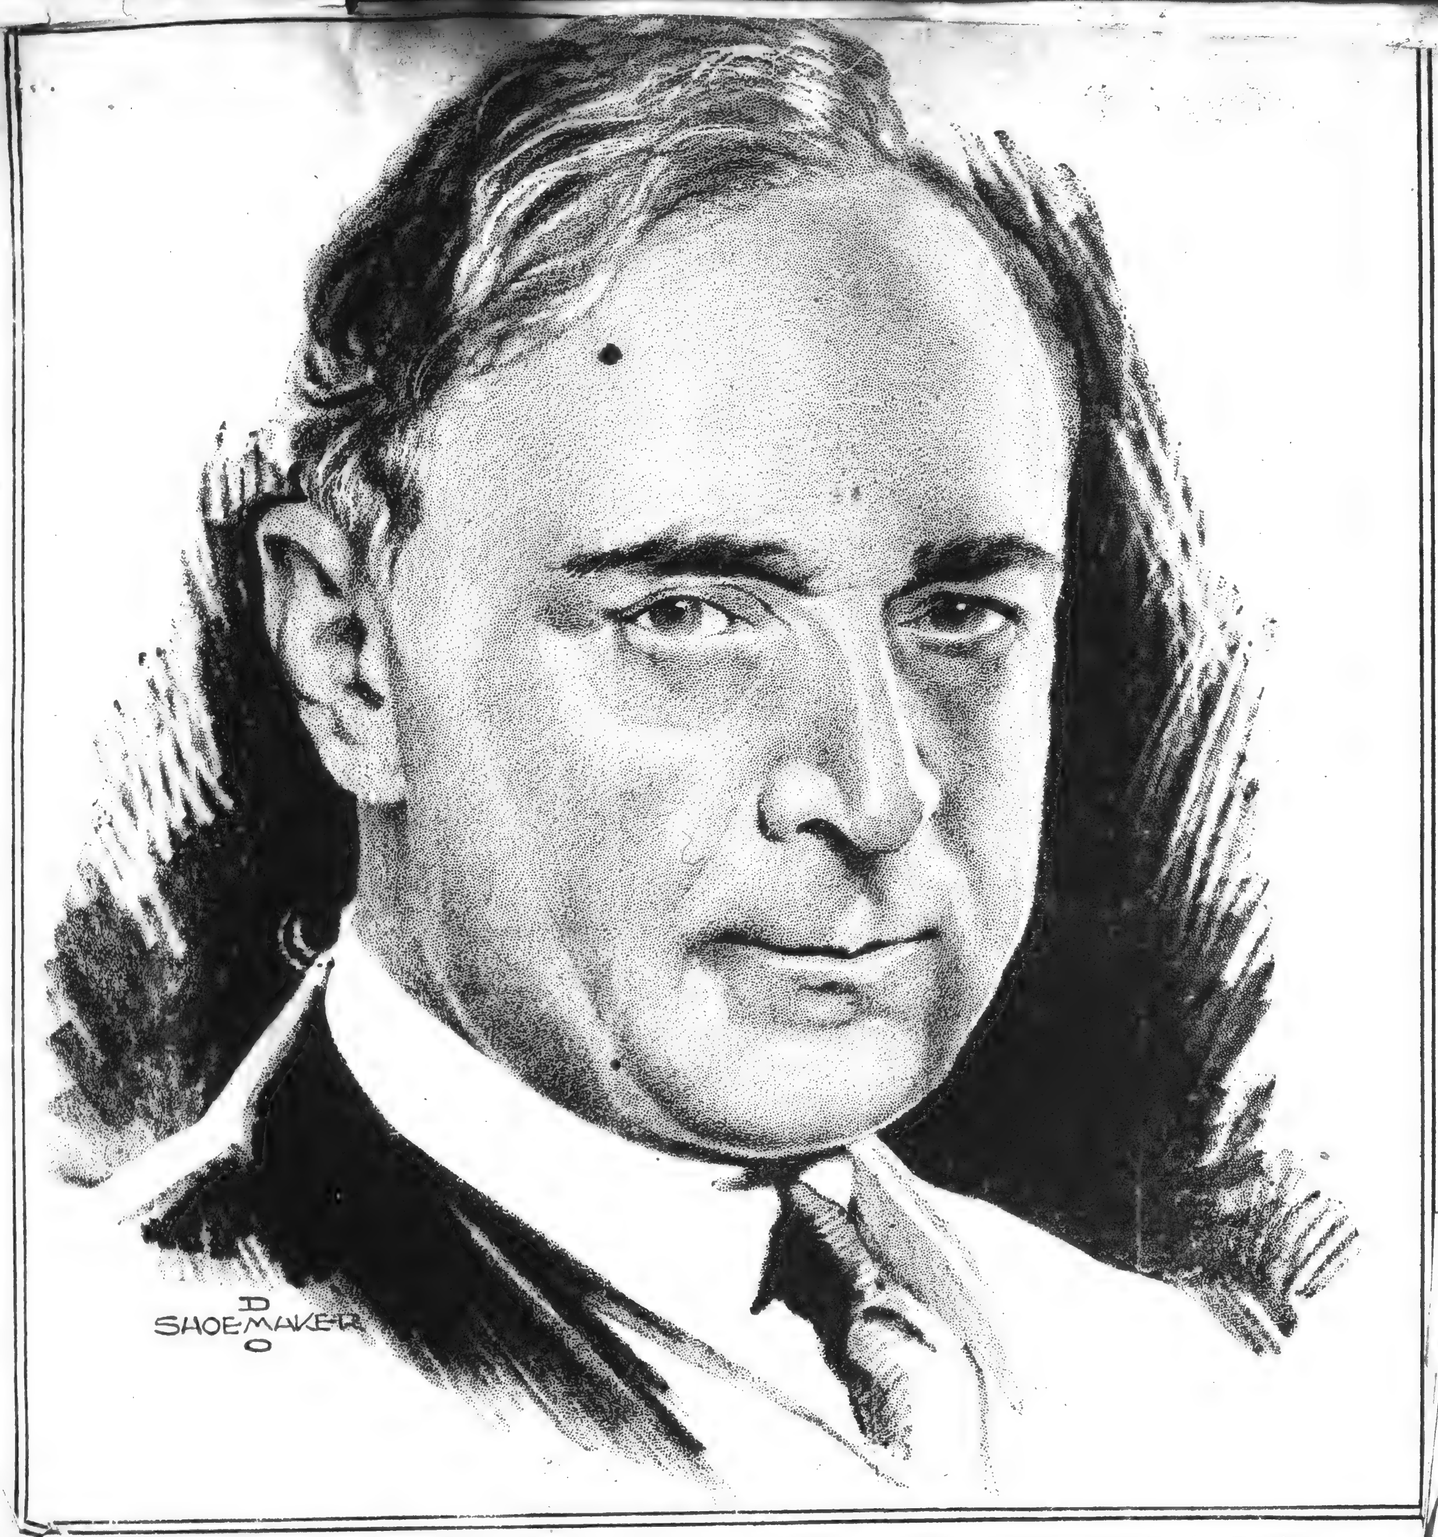
The Philadelphia Orchestra, under the direction of Leopold Stokowski, will give its second concert in the New York series at Carnegie Hall Tuesday evening at 8.45. The program contains: Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony (No. 3—E flat); Deems Taylor's "Jurgen," and Edward Elgar's Variations on an Original Theme ("Enigma").

As heretofore, the doors will be closed after the beginning of the concert until the intermission, and after the interval of the concert.

season this week, playing at Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon and at the Brooklyn Academy Friday evening. On Thursday Dr. Koussevitzky offers familiar numbers; on Saturday he will give the first New York performance of Louis Greunberg's symphonic poem, "The Enchanted Isle," whose publication has been underwritten by the Juilliard Foundation.

The work is one of four tone poems whose inspiration dates back to the war period, but which were scored more recently. "The Enchanted Isle" won the second prize in the American zone in the 1928 Schubert centennial contest, and was first played last month at the Worcester Festival under Albert Stoessel. Dr. Koussevitzky first gave it in Boston on November 8 and 9.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Times
NOV 17 1929



Serge Koussevitzky, Who Conducts the Opening Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Next Thursday Evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HERALD
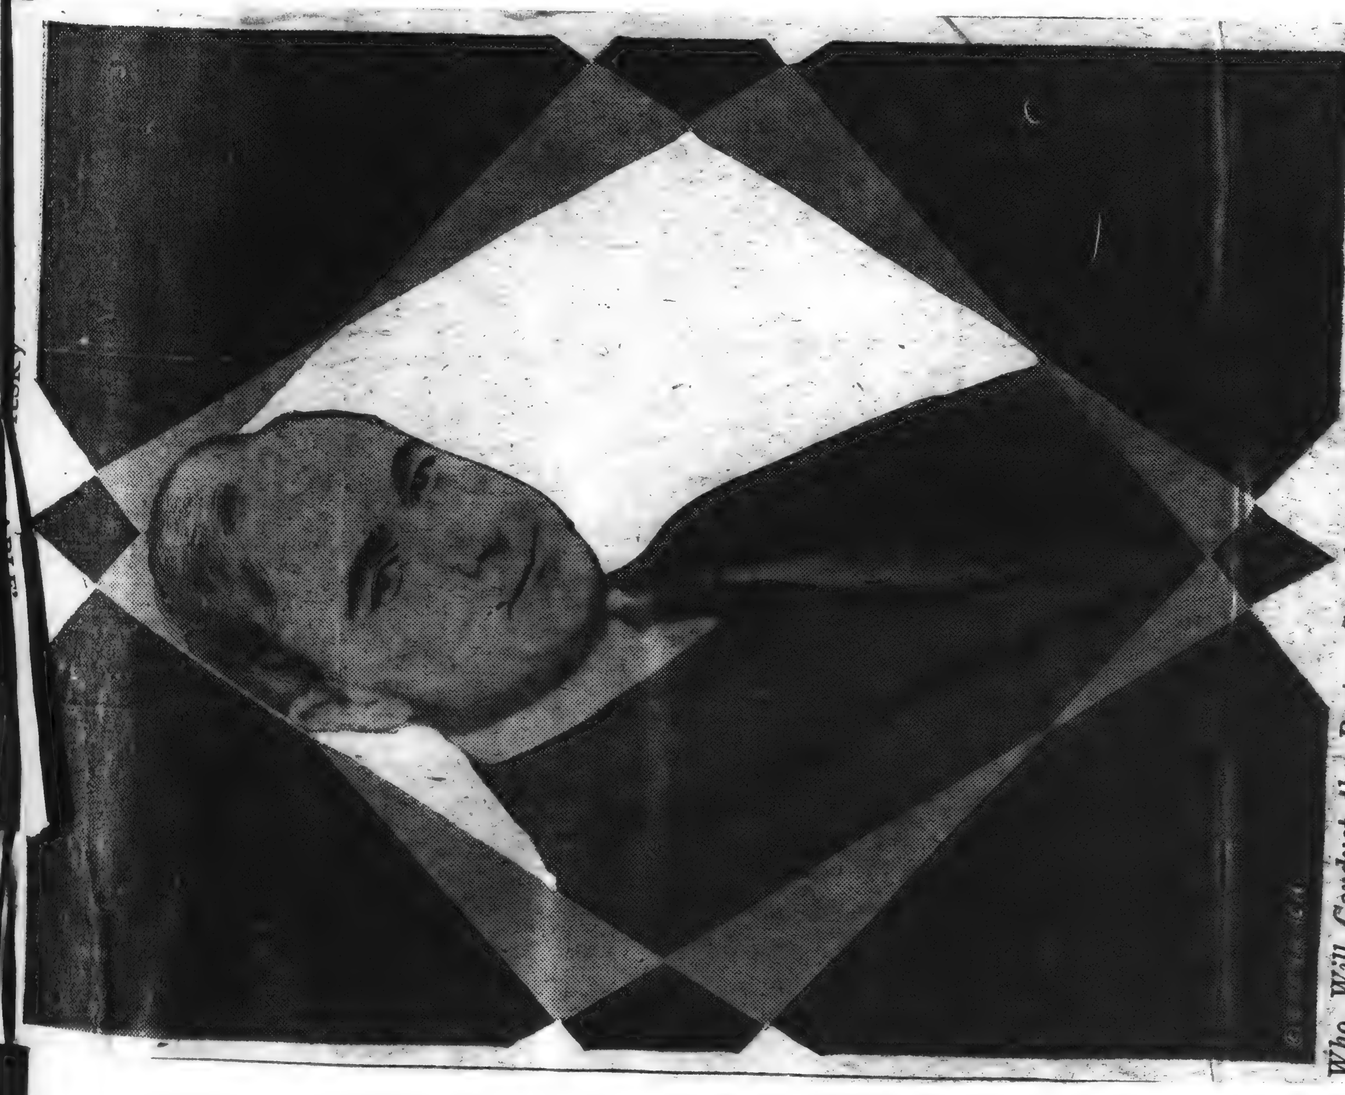
NOV

...n Various Forms of Her...



Who Will Conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Manhattan and Brooklyn This Coming Week

Serge Koussevitzky, who conducts the Boston Symphony this week in its first New York concerts of the season

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
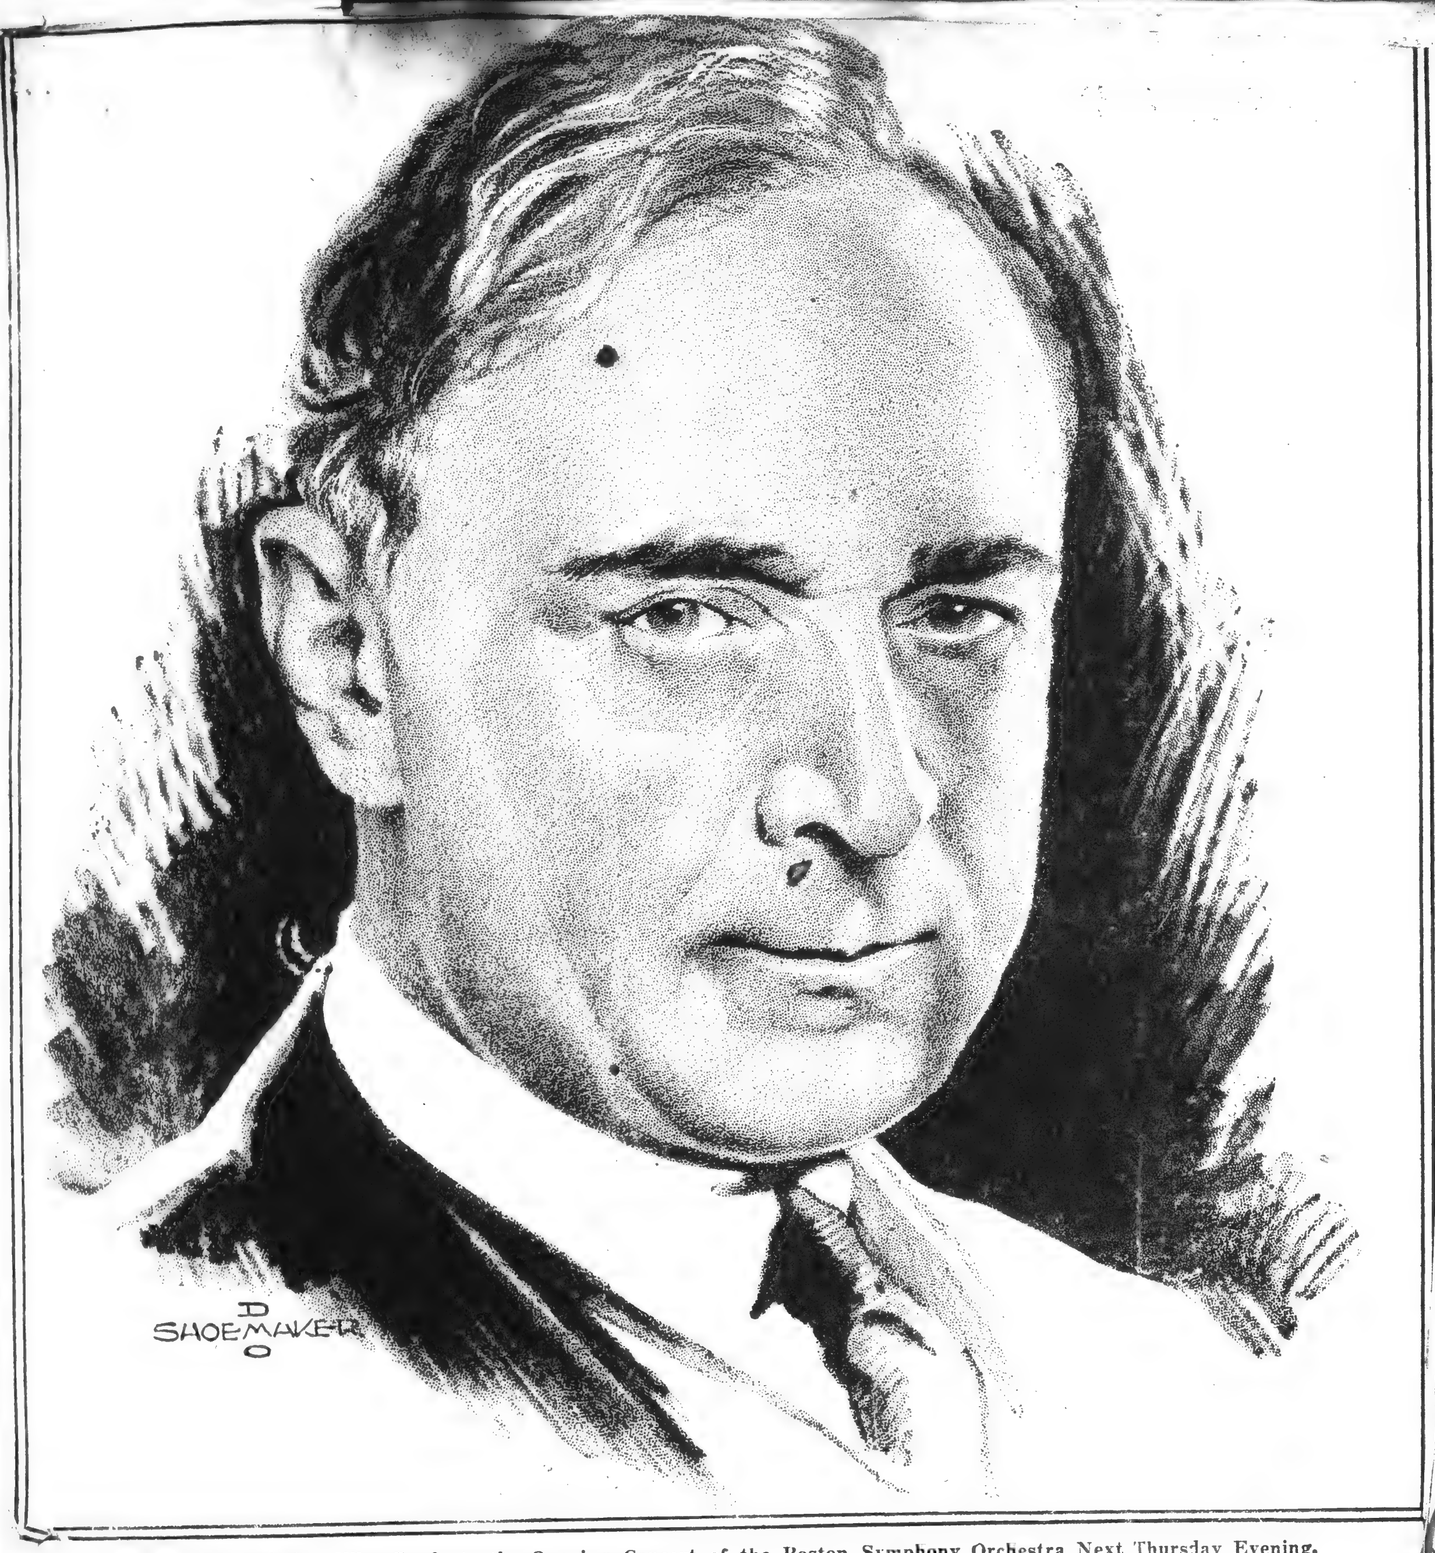
DAILY EAGLE
NOV 17

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Times
NOV 17 1929



Serge Koussevitzky, Who Conducts the Opening Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Next Thursday Evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
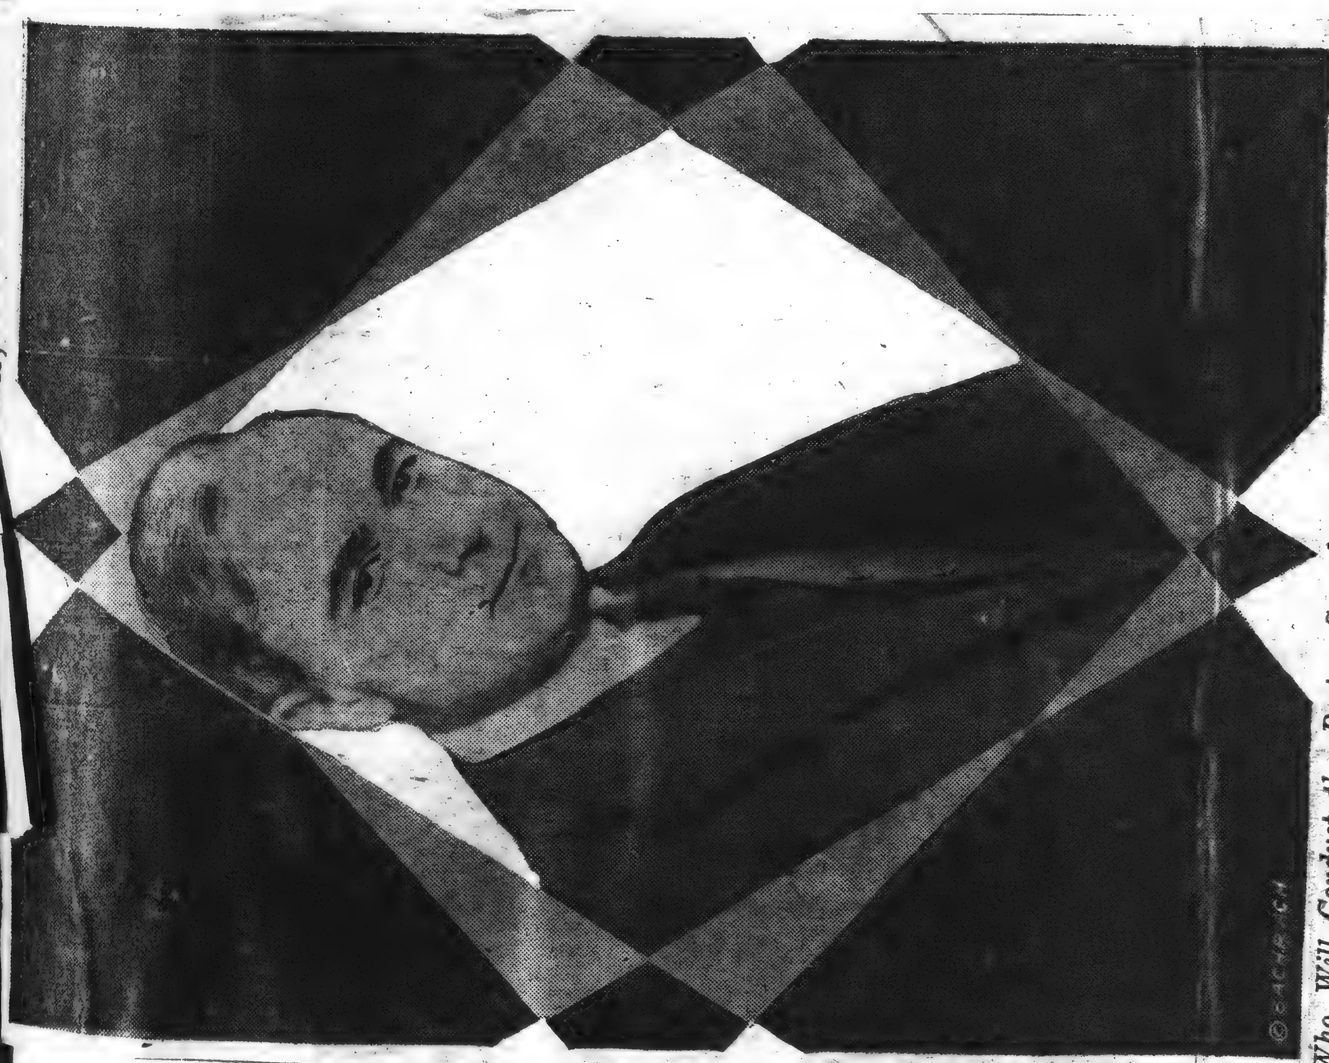
DAILY EAGLE
NOV 17



Who Will Conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Manhattan and Brooklyn Concerts During the Coming Week

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD

...n Various Forms of Her...

...o conducts the Boston Symphony ... New York concerts of the season

INCORRECT PAGINATION

133

THIS CLIPPING FROM
The Times
NOV

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Koussevitzky Scores Triumph.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra made their first New York appearance of the season last night in Carnegie Hall. The orchestra is more than ever a sheer delight and intoxication to the ear. The tone is of velvet or of gold, as the case may be. The orchestra is completely responsive to Mr. Koussevitzky's slightest wish.

On the program last night he placed the Beethoven "Egmont" overture, Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite, Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. The performance of the Ravel suite was the special triumph of the first part of the program. This is music of an artificial kind, but here the artifice is art. As we know, the suite when it was first composed was played four hands by two children. The orchestral version is more fascinating than the version for piano, since Ravel, a veritable wizard of instrumentation, can here employ all the most delicate tone colors and with a mastery which never fails to impress the listeners anew.

The score is full of the most delicate conceits. These are marvels of fastidious coloring. One wonders whether there has been another modern master with such a knowledge and instinct for the tone-tints of the orchestra. Debussy had this instinct, and a greater and more original talent than Ravel, but Ravel is the more precise of the two in his management of pigments. His children are Parisian children. They are not the apple-cheeked pair of Humperdinck. Nor do they belong to a hockey team or a folk-dance society. They inhabit drawing room and never go out to walk ungloved. Just the same, this is a delightful work of a highly finished and sophisticated sort. There is the flavor of the "contes bleues," even a suggestion of the medieval hinterland of the imagination from which they came. And all this was admirably conveyed by Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra.

As for Strauss, we have not heard "Till Eulenspiegel" played with more prevailing justness of pace and a finer molding of phrase and adjustment of detail. The scoring is very clean and clear, save in those places where Strauss is deliberately noisy and intentionally coarse. The performance made it the clearer. What was missing was the demoniac energy and defiance, the mad waggery, or the sudden haunting tenderness of the music with which Strauss himself, when he visited this country for the first time some twenty-five years ago, informed it. Perhaps distance lends enchantment to that visit, but it seemed music was never more highly charged and explosive, despite the poetry and the golden thread of folk-tale running through it.

Comparison of a conductor's interpretation with that of a composer does not, of course, necessarily establish standards, and comparison of Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting with that of Richard Strauss would be today highly disadvantageous to the latter gentleman. But the Till who fled Puck-like through the orchestra last night would not have alarmed and dismayed the bourgeois, would not have been summoned before the town council, denounced for his courageous misdeeds and indignantly strung up on the gallows. This Till was a harmless sprite. Boston would have harbored him with pleasure, and even Harvard. But Mr. O'Neill might have felt bored in his company.

There was a finely balanced and proportioned reading of the Beethoven overture, with the sombre chords that tower over the music of revolt, supplication, suspense—music which gives way at last to frantic rejoicing. Here, too, there could have been a more savage bite of the strings in the opening of the movement proper, a sharper thrust, a more passionate accent. The symphony is a work that Mr. Koussevitzky has shown, ere this, he can read in a nobly dramatic yet not slavishly conventional manner.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING SUN
NOV 2

Boston Symphony Concert

Koussevitzky Includes Ravel Music in Initial Program for This Season.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra made their first local appearance of the season at Carnegie Hall last evening. The program was of substance. It began with Beethoven and ended with him. The first number was the "Egmont" overture, from which by use of the subtle art of transition Mr. Koussevitzky carried his auditors by way of Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye" to the merry pranks of Richard Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel." From this to Beethoven's fifth symphony was the next step, a rather long one to be sure, but it sufficed to bring the concert to a successful conclusion.

A program containing no novelty does not seem to call for prolonged discussion. There is always something to say about Ravel whose orchestral virtuosity lately aroused excitement when displayed in his "Bolero," but we suspect that despite the growing skepticism of flaming youth the fifth symphony will be performed before attentive listeners in far off years when "La Belle au Bois Dormant" cannot again be awakened. And nevertheless that is delightful music.

It possesses indefinable charm and a delicacy of fancy which are as rare as they are precious. It has, too, that aristocratic quality, that fine air of being "hoch geboren," which is to be found in all Ravel's music. Mr. Koussevitzky did not have to wait till last night to show music lovers that he was deeply in sympathy with this composer's ideals. He has lived too much in Paris and been too thoroughly saturated with the spirit of the Boulevard romanticism dominating all recent French art to be insensible to the individual nature of Ravel's creations.

But it was not in the elegant and highly polished fairy tale of Ravel that Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston musicians rose to commanding stature last evening. It was in the masterpiece of the German. One becomes more certain at each repetition that "Til Eulenspiegel" is the summit of Strauss's ascent with the orchestra. That vital fire of its content was always smoldering on the hearth of his genius is proved by the lovely bits which float through the score of "Der Rosenkavalier" and less prominent repetitions found in other later works. What Til has to do with the reflections of the Princess Werdenberg is more difficult to conjecture than the remote but perceptible connection between the rogue and Baron Ochs.

But this is a matter of no deep import. Every writer has his own pet forms and phrases. What was more impressive last night was the magnificent performance of the tone poem. There was not a thematic fragment that did not seem to fall spontaneously and perfectly into its place in the shimmering web of orchestration. Such a fastidious observance of proportion is not common and it bespoke not only earnest rehearsal but ideal communication between conductor and players. The scheme of development carried the interpretation from a whispering pianissimo to the thunderous and crushing forte which sent Til squeaking to his doom.

All was luminous and vivid, vital and yet touched with that strain of tenderness without which any reading of "Til Eulenspiegel" must fall short of the composer's intent. In short, it was a masterly presentation of a composition which has often been played admirably, sometimes superlatively, but assuredly never with a more sweeping gamut of orchestral splendors, never with a firmer outlining of its design, than last evening. The Boston Symphony Orchestra not only returned to town but to its golden era.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD
NOV 2

Music

By Samuel Chotzinoff.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall, 8.30 P. M.
Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven
Mother Goose Suite.....Ravel
Till Eulenspiegel.....Strauss
Symphony No. 5, in C Minor.....Beethoven

Last night the Boston Orchestra played for us in Carnegie Hall for the first time this season, and we noticed, as we did last fall and at the initial concert of every season since Mr., or rather Dr., Koussevitzky assumed the helm of the Bostonians, that the famous band was approaching closer to its pre-war excellence.

It must not be forgotten that it was considerably easier to achieve and maintain the position the Boston Symphony held in the old days, than it would be now when a good orchestra is the rule and not the exception. Where the old Boston had no real competitors it must face at the present moment two formidable rivals in the Philadelphia and the Philharmonic-Symphony.

It so happened that the three eminent organizations placed themselves on exhibition in Carnegie Hall on succeeding nights this week, making comparison, though probably uninvited, inevitable. It behooves one to record, therefore, that last night's visitor came through the ordeal happily. One admired especially the unanimity of attack in the playing of the Boston Orchestra, its equalized dynamic range which encompassed a beautiful pianissimo and a fortissimo free of noise and its acquisition of a uniform healthy and glowing tone.

In the matter of interpretation Mr. Koussevitzky's musical desires appear to be definite to the point of dogmaticism, giving one the impression that the versatile Russian knows what he rather than the composer, wants. Thus, both the "Egmont" Overture and the C Minor Symphony of Beethoven were shaped for us last night in the forms of highly theatrical documents, brilliantly executed, but smelling of honest grease paint. The symphony was, in fact, a compelling impersonation, full of dramatic and sometimes melodramatic gestures, barefaced appeals to the emotions and an insistence, perhaps an unconscious one, on the perpetual glare of the spotlight. At the very end of the first movement Mr. Koussevitzky held up the gigantic structure for a moment to give vent to a few plaintive, un-Beethovenish sighs, and he swung into the finale like a labor agitator exhorting a disaffected multitude or an evangelist leading a revival.

The Strauss Rondo was an altogether different story. Here Mr. Koussevitzky, sharing the composer's level, could give free reign to his imagination, and did so with stunning effect. Technically glamorous, his "Till Eulenspiegel" swept gorgeously through his merry pranks, and came, like Petrouchka, to a squealing end. It was an altogether memorable performance, and one which should make the bosoms of the Back Bay folks swell with justifiable pride.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
NOV 2

MUSIC

By Noel Straus

CLAMOR that might swell the soul to rage but did little to kindle soft desire found far too frequent outlet during the first evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday. Mr. Koussevitzky, in rampant mood, rejoiced greatly in letting loose unstemmed floods of crass tone and holding pretty generally in abeyance the subtle tints and rich sonorities usually called forth by his baton.

The program comprised Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, that master's "Egmont" Overture, Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" and that set of five children's pieces by Ravel, known as "Ma Mere L'Oye." It cannot be said that the Boston leader lived up to anticipations in his unfolding of a single one of these familiar creations. The "Egmont" Overture was as unresilient as cast-iron. Goethe's tyrannical Alba held full sway in the reading, to the complete annihilation of the tenderer aspects of the score. By slurring over the latter, Mr. Koussevitzky failed to bring out the stirring emotional contrasts which lie at the root of this masterpiece. Arrived at the joyous culminating pages, the director gave vent to an uproarious din, in which overaccented brasses played an unbridled part.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony has often been better interpreted, but the imperishable composition probably never before sounded as noisy. All of its four movements remained dull, cumbersome and uninspiring. By skimping the tenuti of the portentous unisons in the first movement, lending nothing of mystery to the pianissimi of the development and slurring over the second subject in a way that left it devoid of meaning, Mr. Koussevitzky scarcely made a success of this section. There was no lightness at any point in the Scherzo, and therefore no adequate contrast could be made when the resounding Finale was reached, despite the terrific onslaughts of ugly tone that prevailed in this last division.

The essentially Germanic character of the music in Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" eluded the conductor almost entirely. Most of it was taken too briskly to satisfy the composer's intentions. And the irony, grotesque humor and romanticism inherent in the tone-poem simply flew out of the window. There was no give in the overhasty phrases of the love scene. Thus the florid sentimentality which Strauss introduced so wittily here fell to the ground. The hero's motive in the first horn was invariably accelerated toward its close, with ill effect, and the legendary atmosphere of the epilogue not so much as hinted at. As for the trial scene, the blaring of trombones and tuba in it might have depicted the end of the world, or some such cosmic cataclysm.

Although not remarkable for fairylike

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
DAILY EAGLE
NOV 2

Music of the Day

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, visiting New York somewhat earlier in the season than has been its custom in the past, inaugurated its annual series of five Thursday evening concerts at Carnegie Hall last evening. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted, presenting a program that included the "Egmont" overture, Ravel's suite, "Ma Mere l'Oye," the "Till Eulenspiegel" of Strauss and Beethoven's C Minor Symphony. Much of this music will be heard at the Academy of Music this evening, on the occasion of the Boston orchestra's seasonal debut in Brooklyn, and a detailed review of its performance may be reserved for tomorrow's Eagle.

But Mr. Kossuvitzky must be felicitated upon the performance which he contrived of "Ma Mere l'Oye." Attention has often been called to his peculiarly sympathetic readings of modern scores, particularly those of an impressionistic tendency, and we were not surprised last evening at the transfiguration that Ravel's charming yet trivial orchestral lyrics underwent, passing through the enkindling imagination of their interpreter. This music, too, the orchestra clothed in the lovely transparent garment of its tone. It is a splendid instrument that Mr. Koussevitzky has developed and perfected since, in 1924, he first undertook command of the Boston Symphony, and for this he deserves the gratitude as well as the admiration of his audience. E. C.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN
NOV 22

WELL-VARIED MUSIC PERFORMED BY THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

VARIETY was one of the spices of the programme presented last evening at Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky opened his annual series here with Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," and Beethoven's fifth symphony, the quartet of works representing an exceptionally well-balanced list.

Beethoven's "Egmont," with its proud sentiment and robustious passion, fared well at the hands of Koussevitzky. However, it did not garner the reptuous applause which followed his imaginative interpretation of Ravel's sensitive, fine-spun orchestral conceit.

The Russian conductor's communicative art was reflected brilliantly in the whimsical delivery, lovely colorings and fastidious feats of tone and technic with which he and his players invested their performance of Ravel's delicious piece of symphonic tomfoolery.

Moves at Vital Pace

The "Mother" skylarks innocently enough in comparison with "Eulenspiegel," whose rollickings, often criminally ribald, finally land him in the hangman's hands. Strauss gives you even the clarinet shrilling which denotes Till's last squeak choked forth by the rope.

Koussevitzky made the Strauss poem move at a vital pace but lost none of its pictorial fun and broad suggestiveness. It was a brilliant virtuoso achievement by the leader and his men.

Press exigencies permitted me to hear only the first movement of the Beethoven symphony, and I liked the rugged attack of the leading theme, the rhythmic precision in its developments, and the skilful blending of the dramatic and lyrical elements.

In spite of the deep philosophical import given to the first movement of the "Fifth" by wordy commentators, it remains one of the most transparently constructed pieces of writing in the entire realm of symphony. Those conductors who try to give the movement a so-called "reading" usually wander into a hopeless morass of artificiality and affectation.

Koussevitzky allowed the composer to speak for himself and we heard the voice of Beethoven.

INCORRECT PAGINATION

133

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Times
Nov

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Koussevitzky Scores Triumph.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra made their first New York appearance of the season last night in Carnegie Hall. The orchestra is more than ever a sheer delight and intoxication to the ear. The tone is of velvet or of gold, as the case may be. The orchestra is completely responsive to Mr. Koussevitzky's slightest wish.

On the program last night he placed the Beethoven "Egmont" overture, Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite, Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. The performance of the Ravel suite was the special triumph of the first part of the program. This is music of an artificial kind, but here the artifice is art. As we know, the suite when it was first composed was played four hands by two children. The orchestral version is more fascinating than the version for piano, since Ravel, a veritable wizard of instrumentation, can here employ all the most delicate tone colors and with a mastery which never fails to impress the listeners anew.

The score is full of the most delicate conceits. These are marvels of fastidious coloring. One wonders whether there has been another modern master with such a knowledge and instinct for the tone-tints of the orchestra. Debussy had this instinct, and a greater and more original talent than Ravel, but Ravel is the more precise of the two in his management of pigments. His children are Parisian children. They are not the apple-cheeked pair of Humperdinck. Nor do they belong to a hockey team or a folk-dance society. They inhabit drawing room and never go out to walk ungloved. Just the same, this is a delightful work of a highly finished and sophisticated sort. There is the flavor of the "contes bleues," even a suggestion of the medieval hinterland of the imagination from which they came. And all this was admirably conveyed by Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra.

As for Strauss, we have not heard "Till Eulenspiegel" played with more prevailing justness of pace and a finer molding of phrase and adjustment of detail. The scoring is very clean and clear, save in those places where Strauss is deliberately noisy and intentionally coarse. The performance made it the clearer. What was missing was the demoniac energy and defiance, the mad waggery, or the sudden haunting tenderness of the music with which Strauss himself, when he visited this country for the first time some twenty-five years ago, informed it. Perhaps distance lends enchantment to that visit, but it seemed music was never more highly charged and explosive, despite the poetry and the golden thread of folk-tale running through it.

Comparison of a conductor's interpretation with that of a composer does not, of course, necessarily establish standards, and comparison of Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting with that of Richard Strauss would be today highly disadvantageous to the latter gentleman. But the Till who fled Puck-like through the orchestra last night would not have alarmed and dismayed the bourgeois, would not have been summoned before the town council, denounced for his courageous misdeeds and indignantly strung up on the gallows. This Till was a harmless sprite. Boston would have harbored him with pleasure, and even Harvard. But Mr. O'Neill might have felt bored in his company.

There was a finely balanced and proportioned reading of the Beethoven overture, with the sombre chords that tower over the music of revolt, supplication, suspense—music which gives way at last to frantic rejoicing. Here, too, there could have been a more savage bite of the strings in the opening of the movement proper, a sharper thrust, a more passionate accent. The symphony is a work that Mr. Koussevitzky has shown, ere this, he can read in a nobly dramatic yet not slavishly conventional manner.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING SUN
NOV 2

Boston Symphony Concert

Koussevitzky Includes Ravel Music in Initial Program for This Season.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra made their first local appearance of the season at Carnegie Hall last evening. The program was of substance. It began with Beethoven and ended with him. The first number was the "Egmont" overture, from which by use of the subtle art of transition Mr. Koussevitzky carried his auditors by way of Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye" to the merry pranks of Richard Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel." From this to Beethoven's fifth symphony was the next step, a rather long one to be sure, but it sufficed to bring the concert to a successful conclusion.

A program containing no novelty does not seem to call for prolonged discussion. There is always something to say about Ravel whose orchestral virtuosity lately aroused excitement when displayed in his "Bolero," but we suspect that despite the growing skepticism of flaming youth the fifth symphony will be performed before attentive listeners in far off years when "La Belle au Bois Dormant" cannot again be awakened. And nevertheless that is delightful music.

It possesses indefinable charm and a delicacy of fancy which are as rare as they are precious. It has, too, that aristocratic quality, that fine air of being "hoch geboren," which is to be found in all Ravel's music. Mr. Koussevitzky did not have to wait till last night to show music lovers that he was deeply in sympathy with this composer's ideals. He has lived too much in Paris and been too thoroughly saturated with the spirit of the Boulevard romanticism dominating all recent French art to be insensible to the individual nature of Ravel's creations.

But it was not in the elegant and highly polished fairy tale of Ravel that Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston musicians rose to commanding stature last evening. It was in the masterpiece of the German. One becomes more certain at each repetition that "Til Eulenspiegel" is the summit of Strauss's ascent with the orchestra. That vital fire of its content was always smoldering on the hearth of his genius is proved by the lovely bits which float through the score of "Der Rosenkavalier" and less prominent repetitions found in other later works. What Til has to do with the reflections of the Princess Werdenberg is more difficult to conjecture than the remote but perceptible connection between the rogue and Baron Ochs.

But this is a matter of no deep import. Every writer has his own pet forms and phrases. What was more impressive last night was the magnificent performance of the tone poem. There was not a thematic fragment that did not seem to fall spontaneously and perfectly into its place in the shimmering web of orchestration. Such a fastidious observance of proportion is not common and it bespoke not only earnest rehearsal but ideal communication between conductor and players. The scheme of development carried the interpretation from a whispering pianissimo to the thunderous and crushing forte which sent Til squeaking to his doom.

All was luminous and vivid, vital and yet touched with that strain of tenderness without which any reading of "Til Eulenspiegel" must fall short of the composer's intent. In short, it was a masterly presentation of a composition which has often been played admirably, sometimes superlatively, but assuredly never with a more sweeping gamut of orchestral splendors, never with a firmer outlining of its design, than last evening. The Boston Symphony Orchestra not only returned to town but to its golden era.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD
NOV 2

Music

By Samuel Chotzinoff.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall, 8.30 P. M.

Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven
Mother Goose Suite.....Ravel
Till Eulenspiegel.....Strauss
Symphony No. 5, in C Minor.....Beethoven

Last night the Boston Orchestra played for us in Carnegie Hall for the first time this season, and we noticed, as we did last fall and at the initial concert of every season since Mr., or rather Dr., Koussevitzky assumed the helm of the Bostonians, that the famous band was approaching closer to its pre-war excellence.

It must not be forgotten that it was considerably easier to achieve and maintain the position the Boston Symphony held in the old days, than it would be now when a good orchestra is the rule and not the exception. Where the old Boston had no real competitors it must face at the present moment two formidable rivals in the Philadelphia and the Philharmonic-Symphony.

It so happened that the three eminent organizations placed themselves on exhibition in Carnegie Hall on succeeding nights this week, making comparison, though probably uninvited, inevitable. It behooves one to record, therefore, that last night's visitor came through the ordeal happily. One admired especially the unanimity of attack in the playing of the Boston Orchestra, its equalized dynamic range which encompassed a beautiful pianissimo and a fortissimo free of noise and its acquisition of a uniform healthy and glowing tone.

In the matter of interpretation Mr. Koussevitzky's musical desires appear to be definite to the point of didacticism, giving one the impression that the versatile Russian knows what he rather than the composer, wants. Thus, both the "Egmont" Overture and the C Minor Symphony of Beethoven were shaped for us last night in the forms of highly theatrical documents, brilliantly executed, but smelling of honest grease paint. The symphony was, in fact, a compelling impersonation, full of dramatic and sometimes melodramatic gestures, barefaced appeals to the emotions and an insistence, perhaps an unconscious one, on the perpetual glare of the spotlight. At the very end of the first movement Mr. Koussevitzky held up the gigantic structure for a moment to give vent to a few plaintive, un-Beethovenish sighs, and he swung into the finale like a labor agitator exhorting a disaffected multitude or an evangelist leading a revival.

The Strauss Rondo was an altogether different story. Here Mr. Koussevitzky, sharing the composer's level, could give free reign to his imagination, and did so with stunning effect. Technically glamorous, his "Till Eulenspiegel" swept gorgeously through his merry pranks, and came, like Petrouchka, to a squealing end. It was an altogether memorable performance, and one which should make the bosoms of the Back Bay folks swell with justifiable pride.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
NOV 2

MUSIC

By Noel Straus

CLAMOR that might swell the soul to rage but did little to kindle soft desire found far too frequent outlet during the first evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday. Mr. Koussevitzky, in rampant mood, rejoiced greatly in letting loose unstemmed floods of crass tone and holding pretty generally in abeyance the subtle tints and rich sonorities usually called forth by his baton.

The program comprised Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, that master's "Egmont" Overture, Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" and that set of five children's pieces by Ravel, known as "Ma Mere L'Oye." It cannot be said that the Boston leader lived up to anticipations in his unfolding of a single one of these familiar creations. The "Egmont" Overture was as unresilient as cast-iron. Goethe's tyrannical Alba held full sway in the reading, to the complete annihilation of the tenderer aspects of the score. By slurring over the latter, Mr. Koussevitzky failed to bring out the stirring emotional contrasts which lie at the root of this masterpiece. Arrived at the joyous culminating pages, the director gave vent to an uproarious din, in which overaccented brasses played an unbridled part.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony has often been better interpreted, but the imperishable composition probably never before sounded as noisy. All of its four movements remained dull, cumbersome and uninspiring. By skimping the tenuti of the portentous unisons in the first movement, lending nothing of mystery to the pianissimi of the development and slurring over the second subject in a way that left it devoid of meaning, Mr. Koussevitzky scarcely made a success of this section. There was no lightness at any point in the Scherzo, and therefore no adequate contrast could be made when the resounding Finale was reached, despite the terrific onslaughts of ugly tone that prevailed in this last division.

The essentially Germanic character of the music in Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" eluded the conductor almost entirely. Most of it was taken too briskly to satisfy the composer's intentions. And the irony, grotesque humor and romanticism inherent in the tone-poem simply flew out of the window. There was no give in the overhasty phrases of the love scene. Thus the florid sentimentality which Strauss introduced so wittily here fell to the ground. The hero's motive in the first horn was invariably accelerated toward its close, with ill effect, and the legendary atmosphere of the epilogue not so much as hinted at. As for the trial scene, the blaring of trombones and tuba in it might have depicted the end of the world, or some such cosmic cataclysm.

Although not remarkable for fairylike delicacy or fecund imagination, the rendition of the Ravel numbers was at least a relief from the thunderings of the rest of the evening's entertainment.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
[illegible] what earlier
[illegible] has been its custom in the past, inaugurated its annual series of five Thursday evening concerts at Carnegie Hall last evening. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted, presenting a program that included the "Egmont" overture, Ravel's suite, "Ma Mere l'Oye," the "Till Eulenspiegel" of Strauss and Beethoven's C Minor Symphony. Much of this music will be heard at the Academy of Music this evening, on the occasion of the Boston orchestra's seasonal debut in Brooklyn, and a detailed review of its performance may be reserved for tomorrow's Eagle.

But Mr. Kossuvitzky must be felicitated upon the performance which he contrived of "Ma Mere l'Oye." Attention has often been called to his peculiarly sympathetic readings of modern scores, particularly those of an impressionistic tendency, and we were not surprised last evening at the transfiguration that Ravel's charming yet trivial orchestral lyrics underwent, passing through the enkindling imagination of their interpreter. This music, too, the orchestra clothed in the lovely transparent garment of its tone. It is a splendid instrument that Mr. Koussevitzky has developed and perfected since, in 1924, he first undertook command of the Boston Symphony, and for this he deserves the gratitude as well as the admiration of his audience. E. C.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN
NOV 22

WELL-VARIED MUSIC PERFORMED BY THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

VARIETY was one of the spices of the programme presented last evening at Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky opened his annual series here with Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," and Beethoven's fifth symphony, the quartet of works representing an exceptionally well-balanced list.

Beethoven's "Egmont," with its proud sentiment and robustious passion, fared well at the hands of Koussevitzky. However, it did not garner the reptuous applause which followed his imaginative interpretation of Ravel's sensitive, fine-spun orchestral conceit.

The Russian conductor's communicative art was reflected brilliantly in the whimsical delivery, lovely colorings and fastidious feats of tone and technic with which he and his players invested their performance of Ravel's delicious piece of symphonic tomfoolery.

Moves at Vital Pace

The "Mother" skylarks innocently enough in comparison with "Eulenspiegel," whose rollickings, often criminally ribald, finally land him in the hangman's hands. Strauss gives you even the clarinet shrilling which denotes Till's last squeak choked forth by the rope.

Koussevitzky made the Strauss poem move at a vital pace but lost none of its pictorial fun and broad suggestiveness. It was a brilliant virtuoso achievement by the leader and his men.

Press exigencies permitted me to hear only the first movement of the Beethoven symphony, and I liked the rugged attack of the leading theme, the rhythmic precision in its developments, and the skilful blending of the dramatic and lyrical elements.

In spite of the deep philosophical import given to the first movement of the "Fifth" by wordy commentators, it remains one of the most transparently constructed pieces of writing in the entire realm of symphony. Those conductors who try to give the movement a so-called "reading" usually wander into a hopeless morass of artificiality and affectation.

Koussevitzky allowed the composer to speak for himself and we heard the voice of Beethoven.

INCORRECT PAGINATION

133

THIS CLIPPING FROM [illegible]

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Koussevitzky Scores Triumph.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra made their first New York appearance of the season last night in Carnegie Hall. The orchestra is more than ever a sheer delight and intoxication to the ear. The tone is of velvet or of gold, as the case may be. The orchestra is completely responsive to Mr. Koussevitzky's slightest wish.

On the program last night he placed the Beethoven "Egmont" overture, Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite, Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. The performance of the Ravel suite was the special triumph of the first part of the program. This is music of an artificial kind, but here the artifice is art. As we know, the suite when it was first composed was played four hands by two children. The orchestral version is more fascinating than the version for piano, since Ravel, a veritable wizard of instrumentation, can here employ all the most delicate tone colors and with a mastery which never fails to impress the listeners anew.

The score is full of the most delicate conceits. These are marvels of fastidious coloring. One wonders whether there has been another modern master with such a knowledge and instinct for the tone-tints of the orchestra. Debussy had this instinct, and a greater and more original talent than Ravel, but Ravel is the more precise of the two in his management of pigments. His children are Parisian children. They are not the apple-cheeked pair of Humperdinck. Nor do they belong to a hockey team or a folk-dance society. They inhabit drawing room and never go out to walk ungloved. Just the same, this is a delightful work of a highly finished and sophisticated sort. There is the flavor of the "contes bleues," even a suggestion of the medieval hinterland of the imagination from which they came. And all this was admirably conveyed by Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra.

As for Strauss, we have not heard "Till Eulenspiegel" played with more prevailing justness of pace and a finer molding of phrase and adjustment of detail. The scoring is very clean and clear, save in those places where Strauss is deliberately noisy and intentionally coarse. The performance made it the clearer. What was missing was the demoniac energy and defiance, the mad waggery, or the sudden haunting tenderness of the music with which Strauss himself, when he visited this country for the first time some twenty-five years ago, informed it. Perhaps distance lends enchantment to that visit, but it seemed music was never more highly charged and explosive, despite the poetry and the golden thread of folk-tale running through it.

Comparison of a conductor's interpretation with that of a composer does not, of course, necessarily establish standards, and comparison of Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting with that of Richard Strauss would be today highly disadvantageous to the latter gentleman. But the Till who fled Puck-like through the orchestra last night would not have alarmed and dismayed the bourgeois, would not have been summoned before the town council, denounced for his courageous misdeeds and indignantly strung up on the gallows. This Till was a harmless sprite. Boston would have harbored him with pleasure, and even Harvard. But Mr. O'Neill might have felt bored in his company.

There was a finely balanced and proportioned reading of the Beethoven overture, with the sombre chords that tower over the music of revolt, supplication, suspense—music which gives way at last to frantic rejoicing. Here, too, there could have been a more savage bite of the strings in the opening of the movement proper, a sharper thrust, a more passionate accent. The symphony is a work that Mr. Koussevitzky has shown, ere this, he can read in a nobly dramatic yet not slavishly conventional manner.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING SUN
NOV 2

Boston Symphony Concert

Koussevitzky Includes Ravel Music in Initial Program for This Season.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra made their first local appearance of the season at Carnegie Hall last evening. The program was of substance. It began with Beethoven and ended with him. The first number was the "Egmont" overture, from which by use of the subtle art of transition Mr. Koussevitzky carried his auditors by way of Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye" to the merry pranks of Richard Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel." From this to Beethoven's fifth symphony was the next step, a rather long one to be sure, but it sufficed to bring the concert to a successful conclusion.

A program containing no novelty does not seem to call for prolonged discussion. There is always something to say about Ravel whose orchestral virtuosity lately aroused excitement when displayed in his "Bolero," but we suspect that despite the growing skepticism of flaming youth the fifth symphony will be performed before attentive listeners in far off years when "La Belle au Bois Dormant" cannot again be awakened. And nevertheless that is delightful music.

It possesses indefinable charm and a delicacy of fancy which are as rare as they are precious. It has, too, that aristocratic quality, that fine air of being "hoch geboren," which is to be found in all Ravel's music. Mr. Koussevitzky did not have to wait till last night to show music lovers that he was deeply in sympathy with this composer's ideals. He has lived too much in Paris and been too thoroughly saturated with the spirit of the Boulevard romanticism dominating all recent French art to be insensible to the individual nature of Ravel's creations.

But it was not in the elegant and highly polished fairy tale of Ravel that Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston musicians rose to commanding stature last evening. It was in the masterpiece of the German. One becomes more certain at each repetition that "Til Eulenspiegel" is the summit of Strauss's ascent with the orchestra. That vital fire of its content was always smoldering on the hearth of his genius is proved by the lovely bits which float through the score of "Der Rosenkavalier" and less prominent repetitions found in other later works. What Til has to do with the reflections of the Princess Werdenberg is more difficult to conjecture than the remote but perceptible connection between the rogue and Baron Ochs.

But this is a matter of no deep import. Every writer has his own pet forms and phrases. What was more impressive last night was the magnificent performance of the tone poem. There was not a thematic fragment that did not seem to fall spontaneously and perfectly into its place in the shimmering web of orchestration. Such a fastidious observance of proportion is not common and it bespoke not only earnest rehearsal but ideal communication between conductor and players. The scheme of development carried the interpretation from a whispering pianissimo to the thunderous and crushing forte which sent Til squeaking to his doom.

All was luminous and vivid, vital and yet touched with that strain of tenderness without which any reading of "Til Eulenspiegel" must fall short of the composer's intent. In short, it was a masterly presentation of a composition which has often been played admirably, sometimes superlatively, but assuredly never with a more sweeping gamut of orchestral splendors, never with a firmer outlining of its design, than last evening. The Boston Symphony Orchestra not only returned to town but to its golden era.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD
NOV 2

Music

By Samuel Chotzinoff

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall, 8.30 P. M.
Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven
Mother Goose Suite.....Ravel
Till Eulenspiegel.....Strauss
Symphony No. 5, in C Minor.....Beethoven

Last night the Boston Orchestra played for us in Carnegie Hall for the first time this season, and we noticed, as we did last fall and at the initial concert of every season since Mr., or rather Dr., Koussevitzky assumed the helm of the Bostonians, that the famous band was approaching closer to its pre-war excellence.

It must not be forgotten that it was considerably easier to achieve and maintain the position the Boston Symphony held in the old days, than it would be now when a good orchestra is the rule and not the exception. Where the old Boston had no real competitors it must face at the present moment two formidable rivals in the Philadelphia and the Philharmonic-Symphony.

It so happened that the three eminent organizations placed themselves on exhibition in Carnegie Hall on succeeding nights this week, making a comparison, though probably uninvited, inevitable. It behooves one to record, therefore, that last night's visitors came through the ordeal happily. One admired especially the unanimity of attack in the playing of the Boston Orchestra, its equalized dynamic range, which encompassed a beautiful pianissimo and a fortissimo free of noise, and its acquisition of a uniformly healthy and glowing tone.

In the matter of interpretation Mr. Koussevitzky's musical desires appear to be definite to the point of didacticism, giving one the impression that the versatile Russian knows what he, rather than the composer, wants. Thus, both the "Egmont" Overture and the C Minor Symphony of Beethoven were shaped for us last night in the forms of highly theatrical documents, brilliantly executed, but smelling of honest grease paint. The symphony was, in fact, a compelling impersonation, full of dramatic and sometimes melodramatic gestures, barefaced appeals to the emotions and an insistence, perhaps an unconscious one, on the perpetual glare of the spotlight. At the very end of the first movement Mr. Koussevitzky held up the gigantic structure for a moment to give vent to a few plaintive, un-Beethovenish sighs, and he swung into the finale like a labor agitator exhorting a disaffected multitude or an evangelist leading a revival.

The Strauss Rondo was an altogether different story. Here Mr. Koussevitzky, sharing the composer's level, could give free reign to his imagination, and did so with stunning effect. Technically glamorous, his "Till Eulenspiegel" swept gorgeously through his merry pranks, and came, like Petrouchka, to a squealing end. It was an altogether memorable performance, and one which should make the bosoms of the Back Bay folks swell with justifiable pride.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
NOV 2

MUSIC

By Noel Straus

CLAMOR that might swell the soul to rage but did little to kir[illegible]dle soft desire found far too frequent outlet during the first evening [illegible] concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterd[illegible]ay. Mr. Koussevitzky, in rampant mood, rejoiced greatly in letting loose un[illegible]stemmed floods of crass tone and holding pretty generally in abeyance th[illegible]e subtle tints and rich sonorities usually called forth by his baton.

The program comprised Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, that master's "Egmont" Overture, Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" and that set of five children's pieces by Ravel, known as "Ma Mere L'Oye." It cannot be said that the Boston leader lived up to anticipations in [illegible]is unfolding of a single one of these [illegible]illiar creations. The "Egmont" [illegible]ure was as unresilient as cast-iron. [illegible] tyrannical Alba held full sway [illegible]ding, to the complete anni- [illegible]he tenderer aspects of the [illegible]ring over the latter, Mr. [illegible]led to bring out the [illegible] contrasts which lie [illegible]masterpiece. Arrived [illegible]s culminating pages, the [illegible]nt to an uproarious din, [illegible]cented brasses played [illegible] Symphony has [illegible]terpreted, but the [illegible]position probably [illegible]d as noisy. All of [illegible]ts remained dull, [illegible]nspiring. By skimp- [illegible]he portentous uni- [illegible]movement, lending [illegible]y to the pianissimi [illegible]t and slurring over [illegible] in a way that left [illegible]ag, Mr. Koussevitzky [illegible]ccess of this section. [illegible]ness at any point in [illegible]herefore no adequate [illegible] made when the re- [illegible]was reached, despite [illegible]ghts of ugly tone that [illegible]ast division.

[illegible]ermanic character of [illegible]uss's "Till Eulenspie- [illegible]onductor almost en- [illegible]was taken too briskly [illegible]omposer's intentions. [illegible]rotesque humor and [illegible]rent in the tone-poem [illegible]of the window. There [illegible]e overhasty phrases of [illegible]Thus the florid senti- [illegible]Strauss introduced so [illegible]to the ground. The [illegible]the first horn was in- [illegible]ated toward its close, [illegible]and the legendary at- [illegible]e epilogue not so much [illegible]As for the trial scene, [illegible]trombones and tuba in [illegible]depicted the end of the [illegible]such cosmic cataclysm. [illegible] remarkable for fairylike [illegible]cund imagination, the [illegible]e Ravel numbers was at [illegible]rom the thunderings of [illegible]evening's entertainment.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
[illegible]

[illegible]KLYN [illegible]what earlier [illegible]ohan has been its cus- [illegible]n the past, inaugurated its annual series of five Thursday evening concerts at Carnegie Hall last evening. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted, presenting a program that included the "Egmont" overture, Ravel's suite, "Ma Mere l'Oye," the "Till Eulenspiegel" of Strauss and Beethoven's C Minor Symphony. Much of this music will be heard at the Academy of Music this evening, on the occasion of the Boston orchestra's seasonal debut in Brooklyn, and a detailed review of its performance may be reserved for tomorrow's Eagle.

But Mr. Kossuvitzky must be felicitated upon the performance which he contrived of "Ma Mere l'Oye." Attention has often been called to his peculiarly sympathetic readings of modern scores, particularly those of an impressionistic tendency, and we were not surprised last evening at the transfiguration that Ravel's charming yet trivial orchestral lyrics underwent, passing through the enkindling imagination of their interpreter. This music, too, the orchestra clothed in the lovely transparent garment of its tone. It is a splendid instrument that Mr. Koussevitzky has developed and perfected since, in 1924, he first undertook command of the Boston Symphony, and for this he deserves the gratitude as well as the admiration of his audience. E. C.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN
NOV 22

WELL-VARIED MUSIC PERFORMED BY THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

VARIETY was one of the spices of the programme presented last evening at Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky opened his annual series here with Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," and Beethoven's fifth symphony, the quartet of works representing an exceptionally well-balanced list.

Beethoven's "Egmont," with its proud sentiment and robustious passion, fared well at the hands of Koussevitzky. However, it did not garner the reptuous applause which followed his imaginative interpretation of Ravel's sensitive, fine-spun orchestral conceit.

The Russian conductor's communicative art was reflected brilliantly in the whimsical delivery, lovely colorings and fastidious feats of tone and technic with which he and his players invested their performance of Ravel's delicious piece of symphonic tomfoolery.

Moves at Vital Pace

The "Mother" skylarks innocently enough in comparison with "Eulenspiegel," whose rollickings, often criminally ribald, finally land him in the hangman's hands. Strauss gives you even the clarinet shrilling which denotes Till's last squeak choked forth by the rope.

Koussevitzky made the Strauss poem move at a vital pace but lost none of its pictorial fun and broad suggestiveness. It was a brilliant virtuoso achievement by the leader and his men.

Press exigencies permitted me to hear only the first movement of the Beethoven symphony, and I liked the rugged attack of the leading theme, the rhythmic precision in its developments, and the skilful blending of the dramatic and lyrical elements.

In spite of the deep philosophical import given to the first movement of the "Fifth" by wordy commentators, it remains one of the most transparently constructed pieces of writing in the entire realm of symphony. Those conductors who try to give the movement a so-called "reading" usually wander into a hopeless morass of artificiality and affectation.

Koussevitzky allowed the composer to speak for himself and we heard the voice of Beethoven.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
JOURNAL
NOV 22

KOUSSEVITZKY OPENS HERE AT CARNEGIE HALL

By IRVING WEIL.

BEETHOVEN, always at every conductor's elbow, and some musical fairy tales, both French and German, served Mr. Serge Koussevitzky more or less successfully for the opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season at Carnegie Hall last night. There was the now customary houseful of subscribers to these concerts and the Russian director of Boston's musical culture was warmly welcomed by his New York admirers.

It was the Beethoven of the "Egmont" overture, distinctly one of the lesser of these briefer tone poems, that began this opening programme, and the Beethoven of the great but somewhat too current C minor symphony that closed it. Between the two Mr. Koussevitzky played the "Mother Goose" suite of fairy tales of Maurice Ravel (for in France "Ma Mere l'Oye" is rather a different sort of old lady, and she tells stories herself), and Richard Strauss's picaresque folk tale, "Till Eulenspiegel."

Thus children of all ages and grown-ups of none should have been equally pleased. This was, indeed a novel if not a thoroughly unique scheme of programme building, but to this particular nonogenarian it seemed to be more what Hop o' My Thumb himself might have put together than so supposedly logical a person as a grave symphonic conductor.

CURIOUS ASSORTMENT.

However, as Little Jack Horner might say nowadays, the proof of the pudding is not the plums but the cook. And Mr. Koussevitzky, cordon bleu, though he doubtless is, is still neither protean nor versatile enough to have made a consistently acceptable pudding out of this curious assortment of plums.

He was decidedly at his best with the merry pranks [illegible] Eulenspiegel," although T[illegible] how appeared to be neither excessively merry nor prankish. But, perhaps, after all, that was very considerably the fault of the Herr Doktor Strauss. We have observed in the last four or five years with a kind of cumulative conviction that the greatest of Strauss' symphonic poems is always the one that isn't being played at the moment. "Don Juan," for example, seems to capture the palm until someone plays it, and then we are certain "Till Eulenspiegel" should be thus decorated. Mr. Koussevitzky then plays this, and we immediately lean toward, say, "Thus Spake Zarathustra." It is a fascinating game, and almost any number can play.

ROGUE'S PRIMER.

Quite seriously, though, "Till Eulenspiegel" really seems to be getting less and less amusing—to leave importance out of the question—as year follows year. It is only another chapter out of Strauss' gospel of the obvious. All Till's orchestral pranks [illegible] n the [illegible]r, in [illegible] No [illegible]allet stuff; and we shouldn't be in the least surprised to encounter it before long in the sound films.

Ravel's orchestral fairy tales are an immensely different matter, although they are the now scarcely recognizable Ravel of twenty years ago. But they hold a delicately appropriate humor, more implied than expressed, and they need a delicately appropriate touch to bring out all their quality. Mr. Koussevitzky is not a very good teller of this sort of fairy tale.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAM
NOV 22

Bostonian Orchestra Plays Here

Symphony Presents Varied Program at Carnegie.

By HERBERT F. PEYSER.

The Boston Symphony sailed into Carnegie Hall last night with Beethoven fore and aft and Ravel and Strauss amidships. The unloading of this cargo was attended by so great a din that some uncertainty prevailed as to whether Serge Koussevitzky imagined himself the master of a vessel bearing precious merchandise or just heavy freight The first thing catapulted onto the Fifty-Seventh Street landing stage was the "Egmont" overture, which, though it will survive rough and unsympathetic handling, is not materially benefited by it.

Mr. Koussevitzky's treatment of this familiar music was hard, robustious and devoid of a spark of human feeling. Moreover, it established the orchestral keynote of much of the evening, which was a note of crass, unlovely noise. If the coarse excess of sound diminished in the succeeding number it was because Ravel in the five little pieces of his "Ma Mere l'Oye" suite denied Mr. Koussevitzky the opportunity of making it.

These pieces, with their dainty timbres and tinklings, have grown pretty thin and innocuous for adult consumption today and ought to be reserved for the edification of children. The Bostonian leader did not even justify their inclusion in last night's program by a conspicuously fetching or graceful rendering and they flitted by like the inconsequential, featherweight trifles they are. With "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," which was next unshipped one expected at last a measurable compensation, for Mr. Koussevitzky has a reputation with this opus. But again hopes raised on high were incontinently dashed to earth.

However the conductor may have dealt with Strauss' epic rogue on past occasions he seemed yesterday wholly alien to the Germanic spirit of the Owlglass philosophies and picaresque adventures. Again a great racket was unloosed, though it was less the din to which one took exception than the coarse quality of the din.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD Tribune
NOV 22

Orchestra From Boston Offers Concert Here

Capacity Audience Drawn to Carnegie Hall by Visit of Koussevitzky Musicians

Program Is Conservative

Matinee Features Gruenberg's 'Enchanted Isle'

By Francis D. Perkins

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the forty-ninth season of its distinguished career and the sixth under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, opened its first New York visit of the musical year with a concert last night in Carnegie Hall, which, even as on Tuesday for Mr. Stokowski's Philadelphia Orchestra and on Wednesday for Mr. Toscanini's Philharmonic-Symphony, attracted a capacity audience.

While Mr. Koussevitzky has the laudable reputation of an unusually receptive and catholic attitude toward contemporary music, he has proved on many previous occasions that he is not exclusively devoted to compositions of this century, and opened his New York season last night with a conservative program of well known works. He began and ended with Beethoven—the overture to Egmont and the Fifth Symphony—and completed his list with Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

The Boston Symphony, which, we are told, has made no changes in its personnel since last season, is a fine orchestra, and under its Russian director gives a unified, spirited and responsive performance. The string choir last night fell slightly short of achieving the polished song of the Philharmonic-Symphony strings, but its tone is enjoyable and capable of much color, and the high degree of this latter attribute was a general characteristic of last night's performance.

The "Egmont" overture was excellently played, and M. Ravel's "children's pieces" were agreeably performed in a somewhat placid vein. The orchestra began the Strauss tone poem in an easy going, what might be called a "gemutlich," mood, in marked contrast with the proclamative, vividly hued performance of the ensuing measures depicting Till's adventures, misadventures and regrettable end.

In his Carnegie Hall concerts of November, 1928, Mr. Koussevitzky showed that he could avoid the risk of treating Beethoven's Fifth Symphony as a matter of course, and did so last night in a vigorous, fresh performance of marked color and no lack of brilliance. There was much contrast, with assertive climaxes and, occasionally, a touch of stridency, but it was a vivid interpretation, suggesting that the Russian conductor and his musicians were offering this symphony owing to their interest in it, rather than from a sense of duty.

Tomorrow afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky will give the first New York performance of Louis Gruenberg's tone poem, "The Enchanted Isle," on a program with a Mandel Concerto Grosso and Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
STANDARD UNION

Music

By FELIX DEYO

OPENING BROOKLYN CONCERT BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

A PERFORMANCE of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony that left room for discussion concluded the programme of the season's first Brooklyn concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last night. Serge Koussevitzky wielded the baton in far different fashion from his conducting of the same work several years ago, during his first season with the Bostonians, when he startled listeners with an original interpretation.

Last night's Fifth was proof that Mr. Koussevitzky has his moods and tempers. He seemed not to be very interested in what was going on in the Academy of Music. So indifferent was he, apparently, that the symphony unrolled as more of a "playing" than an interpretation. Yet, resentful as his hearers might be of such neglect, it was impossible to dislike the music. Played without enthusiasm, it was still a performance notable for mechanical perfection and no little degree of tonal quality. It would seem that Mr. Koussevitzky can afford to let his mind wander and continue merely to beat time, the while leaving his orchestra otherwise to its own very competent resources. It was a precise, if uninspired and turgid, reading, and what it lacked in fire it partly repaid in orthodoxy.

Handel's sixth Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra (Opus 10), the prelude to "Lohengrin" and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," filled the earlier part of an ultra-conservative programme. All were played efficiently but perfunctorily. Who knows what possible business or gastronomic complications may have been absorbing the attentions of Mr. Koussevitzky when (the subscribers of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences had reason to hope) he should have been concentrating on the job at hand? Perhaps it was none of these; instead merely boredom with an overly-heavy Teutonic programme; but the conductor's most earnest admirer could not have claimed for him that he was at his best last night.

WE ARE BECOMING more convinced than ever that personal grace and nobility of appearance are a handicap to one who must perform on the concert stage, whether as instrumentalist or conductor. It is easy to concentrate on the music when Signor Toscanini is conducting the Philharmonic. There is no distracting influence. Toscanini ranks among the greatest conductors of all time, but there is little in his physical make-up to catch the eye. It is his physiognomy that counts, and that is lost when he turns his back to an audience, as he must do when the orchestra is playing, thus making it easy for one to remove one's eye from him, and, resting them nowhere in particular, to listen—just listen. Unfortunately for Mr. Koussevitzky, his appearance is a distraction to the audience. The liquid movement of his hands and stately gestures ask for watching, and, more often than concert-goers are listening to the music, they are observing Mr. Koussevitzky, his every gesture, as though he were not the conductor of an orchestra, but a Shawn or Mordkin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
TIMES

MUSIC

BOSTONIANS HERE

A brilliant, attentive and appreciative audience greeted Dr. Serge Koussevitzky on his first appearance of the season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music lasst night. His concert, inaugurating the annual series of five, was roundly applauded and apparently enjoyed to the utmost, which would seem to indicate that what Brooklyn audiences like most of all are the tried and true classics such as the Russian conductor presented last night.

In this daring and adventurous day and age, it is something of a novelty in itself to find an orchestral program devoid of novelties. But Dr. Koussevitzky has always shown himself to be an adroit program builder, and it seemed he gauged the preferences of his Brooklyn audience to a fine degree by giving them what he did.

The program opened with the Handel Concerto Grosso No. 10, swept through Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" and the prelude to "Lohengrin," and closed with the ever-popular Beethoven Fifth Symphony. Any laboriousness which might have been noticeable in the concerto disappeared in the gymnastics of the rollicking Strauss poem, and Dr. Koussevitzky's strings soared to glorious heights in the symphony. It would have been a pleasure to see a box reserved for the ostentatious cinema maestros who periodically massacre certain portions of this masterpiece with utter unconcern, in order that the symphony might have proved instructive as well as inspiring.

While he apparently has abanboned his controversial tactics of tempo-changing, Dr. Koussevitzky's touch seems to improve with the years, and his rendition of the Wagner and Beethoven compositions were noteworthy for the delicacy and certainty of the string attack. "Till Eulenspiegel" was played as it should have been, with grace and gaiety, and if this composition does not go down in history as the greatest of Strauss' works, at least it will always finds a place as an excellent vehicle for an orchestra so expert and facile as the Boston Symphony.

J. C. D.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
JOURNAL
NOV 2

KOUSSEVITZKY OPENS HERE AT CARNEGIE HALL

By IRVING WEIL.

BEETHOVEN, always at every conductor's elbow, and some musical fairy tales, both French and German, served Mr. Serge Koussevitzky more or less successfully for the opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season at Carnegie Hall last night. There was the now customary houseful of subscribers to these concerts and the Russian director of Boston's musical culture was warmly welcomed by his New York admirers.

It was the Beethoven of the "Egmont" overture, distinctly one of the lesser of these briefer tone poems, that began this opening programme, and the Beethoven of the great but somewhat too current C minor symphony that closed it. Between the two Mr. Koussevitzky played the "Mother Goose" suite of fairy tales of Maurice Ravel (for in France "Ma Mere l'Oye" is rather a different sort of old lady, and she tells stories herself), and Richard Strauss's picaresque folk tale, "Till Eulenspiegel."

Thus children of all ages and grown-ups of none should have been equally pleased. This was, indeed a novel if not a thoroughly unique scheme of programme building, but to this particular nonogenarian it seemed to be more what Hop o' My Thumb himself might have put together than so supposedly logical a person as a grave symphonic conductor.

CURIOUS ASSORTMENT.

However, as Little Jack Horner might say nowadays, the proof of the pudding is not the plums but the cook. And Mr. Koussevitzky, cordon bleu, though he doubtless is, is still neither protean nor versatile enough to have made a consistently acceptable pudding out of this curious assortment of plums.

He was decidedly at his best with the merry pranks of "Till Eulenspiegel," although Till somehow appeared to be neither excessively merry nor prankish. But, perhaps, after all, that was very considerably the fault of the Herr Doktor Strauss. We have observed in the last four or five years with a kind of cumulative conviction that the greatest of Strauss' symphonic poems is always the one that isn't being played at the moment. "Don Juan," for example, seems to capture the palm until someone plays it, and then we are certain "Till Eulenspiegel" should be thus decorated. Mr. Koussevitzky then plays this, and we immediately lean toward, say, "Thus Spake Zarathustra." It is a fascinating game, and almost any number can play.

ROGUE'S PRIMER.

Quite seriously, though, "Till Eulenspiegel" really seems to be getting less and less amusing—to leave importance out of the question—as year follows year. It is only another chapter out of Strauss' gospel of the obvious. All Till's orchestral pranks are in the manner of a rogue's primer, in musical words of one syllable. No wonder it made excellent ballet stuff; and we shouldn't be in the least surprised to encounter it before long in the sound films.

Ravel's orchestral fairy tales are an immensely different matter, although they are the now scarcely recognizable Ravel of twenty years ago. But they hold a delicately appropriate humor, more implied than expressed, and they need a delicately appropriate touch to bring out all their quality. Mr. Koussevitzky is not a very good teller of this sort of fairy tale.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAM
NOV 22

Bostonian Orchestra Plays Here

Symphony Presents Varied Program at Carnegie.

By HERBERT F. PEYSER.

The Boston Symphony sailed into Carnegie Hall last night with Beethoven fore and aft and Ravel and Strauss amidships. The unloading of this cargo was attended by so great a din that some uncertainty prevailed as to whether Serge Koussevitzky imagined himself the master of a vessel bearing precious merchandise or just heavy freight The first thing catapulted onto the Fifty-Seventh Street landing stage was the "Egmont" overture, which, though it will survive rough and unsympathetic handling, is not materially benefited by it.

Mr. Koussevitzky's treatment of this familiar music was hard, robustious and devoid of a spark of human feeling. Moreover, it established the orchestral keynote of much of the evening, which was a note of crass, unlovely noise. If the coarse excess of sound diminished in the succeeding number it was because Ravel in the five little pieces of his "Ma Mere l'Oye" suite denied Mr. Koussevitzky the opportunity of making it.

These pieces, with their dainty timbres and tinklings, have grown pretty thin and innocuous for adult consumption today and ought to be reserved for the edification of children. The Bostonian leader did not even justify their inclusion in last night's program by a conspicuously fetching or graceful rendering and they flitted by like the inconsequential, featherweight trifles they are. With "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," which was next unshipped one expected at last a measurable compensation, for Mr. Koussevitzky has a reputation with this opus. But again hopes raised on high were incontinently dashed to earth.

However the conductor may have dealt with Strauss' epic rogue on past occasions he seemed yesterday wholly alien to the Germanic spirit of the Owlglass philosophies and picaresque adventures. Again a great racket was unloosed, though it was less the din to which one took exception than the coarse quality of the din.

Concert Here

Capacity Audience Drawn to Carnegie Hall by Visit of Koussevitzky Musicians

Program Is Conservative

Matinee Features Gruenberg's 'Enchanted Isle'

By Francis D. Perkins

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the forty-ninth season of its distinguished career and the sixth under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, opened its first New York visit of the musical year with a concert last night in Carnegie Hall, which, even as on Tuesday for Mr. Stokowski's Philadelphia Orchestra and on Wednesday for Mr. Toscanini's Philharmonic-Symphony, attracted a capacity audience.

While Mr. Koussevitzky has the laudable reputation of an unusually receptive and catholic attitude toward contemporary music, he has proved on many previous occasions that he is not exclusively devoted to compositions of this century, and opened his New York season last night with a conservative program of well known works. He began and ended with Beethoven—the overture to Egmont and the Fifth Symphony—and completed his list with Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

The Boston Symphony, which, we are told, has made no changes in its personnel since last season, is a fine orchestra, and under its Russian director gives a unified, spirited and responsive performance. The string choir last night fell slightly short of achieving the polished song of the Philharmonic-Symphony strings, but its tone is enjoyable and capable of much color, and the high degree of this latter attribute was a general characteristic of last night's performance.

The "Egmont" overture was excellently played, and M. Ravel's "children's pieces" were agreeably performed in a somewhat placid vein. The orchestra began the Strauss tone poem in an easy going, what might be called a "gemutlich," mood, in marked contrast with the proclamative, vividly hued performance of the ensuing measures depicting Till's adventures, misadventures and regrettable end.

In his Carnegie Hall concerts of November, 1928, Mr. Koussevitzky showed that he could avoid the risk of treating Beethoven's Fifth Symphony as a matter of course, and did so last night in a vigorous, fresh performance of marked color and no lack of brilliance. There was much contrast, with assertive climaxes and, occasionally, a touch of stridency, but it was a vivid interpretation, suggesting that the Russian conductor and his musicians were offering this symphony owing to their interest in it, rather than from a sense of duty.

Tomorrow afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky will give the first New York performance of Louis Gruenberg's tone poem, "The Enchanted Isle," on a program with a Mandel Concerto Grosso and Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
STANDARD UNION

Music

By FELIX DEYO

OPENING BROOKLYN CONCERT BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

A PERFORMANCE of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony that left room for discussion concluded the programme of the season's first Brooklyn concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last night. Serge Koussevitzky wielded the baton in ~~the different~~ fashion from his conducting of the same work several years ago, during his first season with the Bostonians, when he startled listeners with an original interpretation.

Last night's Fifth was proof that Mr. Koussevitzky has his moods and tempers. He seemed not to be very interested in what was going on in the Academy of Music. So indifferent was he, apparently, that the symphony unrolled as more of a "playing" than an interpretation. Yet, resentful as his hearers might be of such neglect, it was impossible to dislike the music. Played without enthusiasm, it was still a performance notable for mechanical perfection and no little degree of tonal quality. It would seem that Mr. Koussevitzky can afford to let his mind wander and continue merely to beat time, the while leaving his orchestra otherwise to its own very competent resources. It was a precise, if uninspired and turgid, reading, and what it lacked in fire it partly repaid in orthodoxy.

Handel's sixth Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra (Opus 10), the prelude to "Lohengrin" and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," filled the earlier part of an ultra-conservative programme. All were played efficiently but perfunctorily. Who knows what possible business or gastronomic complications may have been absorbing the attentions of Mr. Koussevitzky when (the subscribers of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences had reason to hope) he should have been concentrating on the job at hand? Perhaps it was none of these; instead merely boredom with an overly-heavy Teutonic programme; but the conductor's most earnest admirer could not have claimed for him that he was at his best last night.

WE ARE BECOMING more convinced than ever that personal grace and nobility of appearance are a handicap to one who must perform on the concert stage, whether as instrumentalist or conductor. It is easy to concentrate on the music when Signor Toscanini is conducting the Philharmonic. There is no distracting influence. Toscanini ranks among the greatest conductors of all time, but there is little in his physical make-up to catch the eye. It is his physiognomy that counts, and that is lost when he turns his back to an audience, as he must do when the orchestra is playing, thus making it easy for one to remove one's eye from him, and, resting them nowhere in particular, to listen—just listen. Unfortunately for Mr. Koussevitzky, his appearance is a distraction to the audience. The liquid movement of his hands and stately gestures ask for watching, and, more often than concert-goers are listening to the music, they are observing Mr. Koussevitzky, his every gesture, as though he were not the conductor of an orchestra, but a Shawn or Mordkin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
TIMES

MUSIC

BOSTONIANS HERE

A brilliant, attentive and appreciative audience greeted Dr. Serge Koussevitzky on his first appearance of the season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music lasst night. His concert, inaugurating the annual series of five, was roundly applauded and apparently enjoyed to the utmost, which would seem to indicate that what Brooklyn audiences like most of all are the tried and true classics such as the Russian conductor presented last night.

In this daring and adventurous day and age, it is something of a novelty in itself to find an orchestral program devoid of novelties. But Dr. Koussevitzky has always shown himself to be an adroit program builder, and it seemed he gauged the preferences of his Brooklyn audience to a fine degree by giving them what he did.

The program opened with the Handel Concerto Grosso No. 10, swept through Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" and the prelude to "Lohengrin," and closed with the ever-popular Beethoven Fifth Symphony. Any laboriousness which might have been noticeable in the concerto disappeared in the gymnastics of the rollicking Strauss poem, and Dr. Koussevitzky's strings soared to glorious heights in the symphony. It would have been a pleasure to see a box reserved for the ostentatious cinema maestros who periodically massacre certain portions of this masterpiece with utter unconcern, in order that the symphony might have proved instructive as well as inspiring.

While he apparently has abanboned his controversial tactics of tempo-changing, Dr. Koussevitzky's touch seems to improve with the years, and his rendition of the Wagner and Beethoven compositions were noteworthy for the delicacy and certainty of the string attack. "Till Eulenspiegel" was played as it should have been, with grace and gaiety, and if this composition does not go down in history as the greatest of Strauss' works, at least it will always finds a place as an excellent vehicle for an orchestra so expert and facile as the Boston Symphony.

J. C. D.

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

135

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING POST

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Re-enter the Koussevitzkyans, Bringing With Them an Italicized Imp and a Gallic-Style Mother Goose

IF IT'S modern music—that is, modern French music—or, to be more specific, the music of Maurice Ravel—provided the particular Ravel work is none other than "Ma Mere l'Oye"—give us the Boston Symphony conducted by Serg Koussevitzky, just as we had it last night in the first of the ten concerts Boston is contributing to the welfare of those who congregate in Carnegie Hall. Momentarily, we may not be quite so sure about Beethoven, and even less certain about Richard Strauss.

But when Mr. Koussevitzky was fairly into the "Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty," that is the first of the "Mother Goose" pieces, there was never a doubt with us last night as to the pre-eminence of the Bostonians in this music.

Perhaps it is not the most difficult music in the world to play. But such gossamer delicacy as that which whispered of the spell about "La Belle au Bois Dormant" is certainly not easy of attainment, or it would not be such a rarity in the concert halls. It is permissible to be a little weary of "The conversations of Beauty and the Beast," but "Le Jardin Feerique" regained a charm that, for us, had all but vanished from it until the Boston conductor waved his thaumaturgic wand and bade it return.

Otherwise, this is a record of admirations mixed with dubieties. Mr. Koussevitzky was in a singing mood and we became more engrossed by his vocal pom-pom and tum-tum (his enunciation at least was remarkably good) than by the brilliantly brittle playing of the "Egmont" music.

The Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel" was, for us, particularized to the point of preciosity, and, though much of this meticulously italicized detail was in itself delectably Eulenspiegelish, the hearty gusto, the frank blurtings of a type of coarseness peculiarly that of Mittel-Europa, the abdominal rumblings which underlie the nasal quirks and quiritations of Till's "old-fashioned, roguish manner," were to be sought for in vain in Mr. Koussevitzky's highly individualized performance. We missed also the wistful sentiment customary in the meditations at the beginning and the close; the trombones pronounced their judgment with due weight of legal jurisprudence, but Till was hung by the neck with something less than the usual suggestion of a tear; whether of the beer garden or the haunts of the crocodile let the Muenchener who so deftly wrought the little epilogue finally say. We still like "Till." But we like him best when he is worst; an overrefined imp may come to be no imp at all.

Tonally, the Bostonians were not in their highest estate, but this is not yet mid-season. If there were some rough places that were not made plain in the Fifth Symphony, the ensemble built its climaxes with the Koussevitzky elan; and in its essential spirit this was one of the most gratifying readings of a major Beethoven work the Boston conductor has given us. But to revert to first preferences, our modest mite of contributor's kudos must be bestowed particularly upon the "Mother Goose" Ravel. A brilliant audience had enthusiasms to spare for all that the evening adduced. Standees reached the maximum number, and many appetent ones were turned away.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
[illegible] Tribune

'The Enchanted Isle' Presented Here by Boston Symphony

Louis Gruenberg's New Work Ably Presented Under the Baton of Koussevitzsky

The novelty of yesterday's Boston Symphony matinée at Carnegie Hall, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, was a symphonic poem by Louis Gruenberg, entittled "The Enchanted Isle." Mr. Gruenberg is best known in New York as the composer of "Daniel Jazz," a setting of the poem by Vachel Lindsay. But "The Enchanted Isle" is remote from the world of jazz. It is, according to the composer's own account, "the second of a series of four tone-poems projected during the World War, in an attempt to make the world somewhat pleasanter than the one existing then."

Mr. Gruenberg went to Europe in 1919, and lost interest in those musical efforts to make the world a pleasanter place. Eight years later, in rummaging through a bale of manuscripts, he came across the score of "The Enchanted Isle," whose very existence he had forgotten. As he turned the pages of the score, his music brought back to him the romantic days of his youth, and he determined to recapture a whiff of that enchanted island. He made a complete new score, retaining most of the melodies of the original work, but reworking them in the light of his acquired musicianship. Mr. Koussevitzky introduced the piece to Boston a fortnight ago. Five weeks before, it had been performed for the first time anywhere at the Worcester Festival.

Mr. Gruenberg has said that although his symphonic poem has no definite program it is nevertheless based upon a poetic idea. The idea was this, he explains: "I was dreaming in a blue castle on the top of a hill on an enchanted island, listening to the voices of the valley, trying to create for myself a new world."

The other numbers on yesterday's program were a Concerto Grosso of Handel for strings (No. 10 of Opus 6) and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN

'Enchanted Isle' Given By Boston Symphony

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

That rare occurrence, an American symphonic work played by one of the major orchestras of our land, marked the matinee concert yesterday of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall.

Louis Gruenberg's "The Enchanted Isle" was the composition so favored. That gentleman's birthplace is given as Russia (1883), but he came to this country in 1885 and now lives in Brooklyn. According to our generous national custom of assimilation, Mr. Gruenberg is therefore, an American to all intents and purposes.

We need American composers of talent and we have made no mistake in adopting Mr. Gruenberg into that class.

WRITTEN DURING WAR.

The programme—notes tell that "The Enchanted Isle" was written by its composer during the World War, "in order to make a world somewhat pleasanter than the one existing then;" also that last year Mr. Gruenberg refurbished the piece, which brought back to him the wistful days of his youth; and that he decidede to recapture the atmosphere of those enchanted islands of memory and make a practically news score, retaining the old melodic material but garbing it with his more mature knowledge of orchestration, harmony, and construction; "The Enchanted Isle representing, therefore, a bridge between the old and the new, in the career of the composer.

It is apparent in this music where the old ends and the new begins, but Mr. Gruenberg, never-Wagner, Tschaikowsky, Strauss, Debussy and Rimsky-Korsakoff.

SPIRIT OF YOUTH.

On the whole the underlying idea of his scheme is carried out well by Mr. Gruenberg. The spirit of youth is made up of such lyrical y arning, sentimental reflection and frank gaiety—with even a touch of jazz—as are to be found in "The Enchanted Isle." It is pleasant and suggestive music, scored with a sure and delicate hand, and the audience applauded so warmly that finally the conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, led Mr. Gruenberg to the stage to make his acknowledging bows.

The programme opened with a stylistic and verveful performance of Handel's Concerto Grosso for strings, Opus 6, No. 10, and closed with Tschaikowsky's "[illegible] Pathetique."

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
DAILY EAGLE

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays at the Academy of Music—A Concert by the Lener Quartet—Other Music.

IT WAS a masterful performance of Handel's D minor Concerto Grosso, that with which, last evening at the Academy of Music, an annual series of Brooklyn concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was inaugurated. There was nothing coldly classic about Mr. Koussewitsky's recreation of this music, nothing of awed and impotent reverence for an art remote in period in his interpretation of it.

Too often Handel is presented to us as a magnificent mummy, of Georgian girth, periwigged and impressive, but a corpse, none the less, bloodless and desiccated. Mr. Koussewitsky does not see him this way and will not have us so regard him—but rather as the hardy representative of the 18th Century, who remains in the spirit, if not in the flesh, robust and full-blooded.

Handel was, in a sense, and to a degree, the most masculine of composers; virility charges all his music, gives it body, musculature, invigorates it; this Mr. Koussewitsky realizes and forces us to realize when he plays, as he played last evening, the work of this master. The solid, yet brilliant, tonal sonority, the rhythmic precision and energy of the overture and the allegro movements were remarkable; not less so was the grave tenderness of the Lento, its sedate richness of color and its depth of feeling.

* * *

Fine things were to follow this Handel last evening, but nothing finer nor anything as satisfying. For in the prelude to "Lohengrin," though we might admire Mr. Koussewitsky's firm yet subtle modeling of the long crescendo and diminuendo which, both technically and esthetically, constitutes the form of this piece, the orchestra was guilty of inadvertences which blemished the performance.

And brilliant though was the reading and the playing of "Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche," it did not alter a belief that Mr. Koussewitsky is less than the ideal conductor of Strauss. This music, because it is of our times, Mr. Koussewitsky treats impressionistically, disintegrating the unity of its design, the fusion of its colors, painting it in thematic and coloristic fragments in space, so that it seems confused and sometimes inconsistent.

Even that triumphant proclamation of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony with which the program concluded, and which drew from the audience the most vivid demonstration of the evening, did not, in its adjustment of manner to matter on the part of the interpreting orchestra and conductor, impress one as unexceptionally just. Mr. Koussewitsky, as an interpreter of Beethoven leaves, even more than Mr. Koussewitsky as an interpreter of Strauss, something to be desired.

* * *

It was in the Handel Concerto, too, that last evening the orchestra itself revealed its potency. Before long it may be that this band will regain that position which it enjoyed many years ago when Dr. Karl Muck was its leader and genius. Its deterioration during the later years of the war and the earlier years of peace was at the time lamented. But Mr. Koussewitsky, an autocrat and a disciplinarian, has, during the five seasons of his intendantship, brought about the restoration to the Boston Symphony Orchestra of many of its departed glories. It is today a splendid instrument upon which masterpieces may fittingly be performed—an instrument capable of all the simplicities and subtleties of virtuosity, an orchestra which rivals, though it may not yet surpass, the most celebrated similar organizations in this country and abroad.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD

Music

By Samuel Chotzinoff

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall, 2.30.
Op. 6, ...Handel
Gruenberg
[illegible]netic),
[illegible]haikowsky

many in audience ty of Mr.
e poem,
r. Kousork.

Mr. Gruenberg in recent years has acquired a reputation as a strong left-winger and one was led to expect that his new piece would prove a modernist shocker. Instead of which "The Enchanted Isle," as the Bostonians unfolded it, was neither horrific nor even startling, but proved to be a good old-fashioned narrative piece, nicely put together and exuding the faint but recognizable perfumes used by Ravel, Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Richard Strauss.

However, the whole business was cleared up by a program note in the Boston Orchestra's little booklet. This contained a confession from Mr. Gruenberg that the "Enchanted Isle" was conceived during the World War, subsequently put away in moth balls and only recently exhumed. Mr. Gruenberg also stated that he did not care to divulge what enchanted isles, if any, he had had inmind, and recommended his composition to his audiences as pure music only. Yesterday's audience took the music to its bosom and demanded Mr. Gruenberg in the flesh.

I thought that Mr. Koussevitzky in his presentation of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" symphony was guilty of overdoing the pessimism this work is said to celebrate. Certainly the theme of the Allegro non Troppo, which is first sounded lugubriously in the opening adagio, is not nearly so emotional as the Boston leader would have us believe. It seemed to me that this procedure spilled the melancholy beans right at the outset. Yet Mr. Koussevitzky, being a Russian, can be depended on to put the necessary pathos in the "Pathetique." An audience which filled the house se its approval on the Tschaikowsky an the other music of the afternoon.

135

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING POST

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Re-enter the Koussevitzkyans, Bringing With Them an Italicized Imp and a Gallic-Style Mother Goose

IF IT'S modern music—that is, modern French music—or, to be more specific, the music of Maurice Ravel—provided the particular Ravel work is none other than "Ma Mere l'Oye"—give us the Boston Symphony conducted by Serg Koussevitzky, just as we had it last night in the first of the ten concerts Boston is contributing to the welfare of those who congregate in Carnegie Hall. Momentarily, we may not be quite so sure about Beethoven, and even less certain about Richard Strauss.

But when Mr. Koussevitzky was fairly into the "Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty," that is the first of the "Mother Goose" pieces, there was never a doubt with us last night as to the pre-eminence of the Bostonians in this music.

Perhaps it is not the most difficult music in the world to play. But such gossamer delicacy as that which whispered of the spell about "La Belle au Bois Dormant" is certainly not easy of attainment, or it would not be such a rarity in the concert halls. It is permissible to be a little weary of "The conversations of Beauty and the Beast," but "Le Jardin Feerique" regained a charm that, for us, had all but vanished from it until the Boston conductor waved his thaumaturgic wand and bade it return.

Otherwise, this is a record of admirations mixed with dubieties. Mr. Koussevitzky was in a singing mood and we became more engrossed by his vocal pom-pom and tum-tum (his enunciation at least was remarkably good) than by the brilliantly brittle playing of the "Egmont" music.

The Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel" was, for us, particularized to the point of preciosity, and, though much of this meticulously italicized detail was in itself delectably Eulenspiegelish, the hearty gusto, the frank blurtings of a type of coarseness peculiarly that of Mittel-Europa, the abdominal rumblings which underlie the nasal quirks and quiritations of Till's "old-fashioned, roguish manner," were to be sought for in vain in Mr. Koussevitzky's highly individualized performance. We missed also the wistful sentiment customary in the meditations at the beginning and the close; the trombones pronounced their judgment with due weight of legal jurisprudence, but Till was hung by the neck with something less than the usual suggestion of a tear; whether of the beer garden or the haunts of the crocodile let the Muenchener who so deftly wrought the little epilogue finally say. We still like "Till." But we like him best when he is worst; an overrefined imp may come to be no imp at all.

Tonally, the Bostonians were not in their highest estate, but this is not yet mid-season. If there were some rough places that were not made plain in the Fifth Symphony, the ensemble built its climaxes with the Koussevitzky elan; and in its essential spirit this was one of the most gratifying readings of a major Beethoven work the Boston conductor has given us. But to revert to first preferences, our modest mite of contributor's kudos must be bestowed particularly upon the "Mother Goose" Ravel. A brilliant audience had enthusiasms to spare for all that the evening adduced. Standees reached the maximum number, and many appetent ones were turned away.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
[illegible]

'The Enchanted Isle' Presented Here by Boston Symphony

Louis Gruenberg's New Work Ably Presented Under the Baton of Koussevitzsky

The novelty of yesterday's Boston Symphony matinée at Carnegie Hall, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, was a symphonic poem by Louis Gruenberg, entittled "The Enchanted Isle." Mr. Gruenberg is best known in New York as the composer of "Daniel Jazz," a setting of the poem by Vachel Lindsay. But "The Enchanted Isle" is remote from the world of jazz. It is, according to the composer's own account, "the second of a series of four tone-poems projected during the World War, in an attempt to make the world somewhat pleasanter than the one existing then."

Mr. Gruenberg went to Europe in 1919, and lost interest in those musical efforts to make the world a pleasanter place. Eight years later, in rummaging through a bale of manuscripts, he came across the score of "The Enchanted Isle," whose very existence he had forgotten. As he turned the pages of the score, his music brought back to him the romantic days of his youth, and he determined to recapture a whiff of that enchanted island. He made a complete new score, retaining most of the melodies of the original work, but reworking them in the light of his acquired musicianship. Mr. Koussevitzky introduced the piece to Boston a fortnight ago. Five weeks before, it had been performed for the first time anywhere at the Worcester Festival.

Mr. Gruenberg has said that although his symphonic poem has no definite program it is nevertheless based upon a poetic idea. The idea was this, he explains: "I was dreaming in a blue castle on the top of a hill on an enchanted island, listening to the voices of the valley, trying to create for myself a new world."

The other numbers on yesterday's program were a Concerto Grosso of Handel for strings (No. 10 of Opus 6) and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
AMERICAN

'Enchanted Isle' Given By Boston Symphony

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

That rare occurrence, an American symphonic work played by one of the major orchestras of our land, marked the matinee concert yesterday of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall.

Louis Gruenberg's "The Enchanted Isle" was the composition so favored. That gentleman's birthplace is given as Russia (1883), but he came to this country in 1885 and now lives in Brooklyn. According to our generous national custom of assimilation, Mr. Gruenberg is therefore, an American to all intents and purposes.

We need American composers of talent and we have made no mistake in adopting Mr. Gruenberg into that class.

WRITTEN DURING WAR.

The programme—notes tell that "The Enchanted Isle" was written by its composer during the World War, "in order to make a world somewhat pleasanter than the one existing then;" also that last year Mr. Gruenberg refurbished the piece, which brought back to him the wistful days of his youth; and that he decidede to recapture the atmosphere of those enchanted islands of memory and make a practically news score, retaining the old melodic material but garbing it with his more mature knowledge of orchestration, harmony, and construction; "The Enchanted Isle representing, therefore, a bridge between the old and the new, in the career of the composer.

It is apparent in this music where the old ends and the new begins, but Mr. Gruenberg, nevertheless, has bound together his material with taste, skill and a large degree of fancy. It does not matter that some of his fancy is derivative, the cruel ear of the critic being able to detect suggestions in style from the pages of Wagner, Tschaikowsky, Strauss, Debussy and Rimsky-Korsakoff.

SPIRIT OF YOUTH.

On the whole the underlying idea of his scheme is carried out well by Mr. Gruenberg. The spirit of youth is made up of such lyrical y arning, sentimental reflection and frank gaiety—with even a touch of jazz—as are to be found in "The Enchanted Isle." It is pleasant and suggestive music, scored with a sure and delicate hand, and the audience applauded so warmly that finally the conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, led Mr. Gruenberg to the stage to make his acknowledging bows.

The programme opened with a stylistic and verveful performance of Handel's Concerto Grosso for strings, Opus 6, No. 10, and closed with Tschaikowsky's "[illegible] Pathetique."

IT NOW [illegible] performance of Handel's D minor Concerto Grosso, that with which, last evening at the Academy of Music, an annual series of Brooklyn concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was inaugurated. There was nothing coldly classic about Mr. Koussewitsky's recreation of this music, nothing of awed and impotent reverence for an art remote in period in his interpretation of it.

Too often Handel is presented to us as a magnificent mummy, of Georgian girth, periwigged and impressive, but a corpse, none the less, bloodless and desiccated. Mr. Koussewitsky does not see him this way and will not have us so regard him—but rather as the hardy representative of the 18th Century, who remains in the spirit, if not in the flesh, robust and full-blooded.

Handel was, in a sense, and to a degree, the most masculine of composers; virility charges all his music, gives it body, musculature, invigorates it; this Mr. Koussewitsky realizes and forces us to realize when he plays, as he played last evening, the work of this master. The solid, yet brilliant, tonal sonority, the rhythmic precision and energy of the overture and the allegro movements were remarkable; not less so was the grave tenderness of the Lento, its sedate richness of color and its depth of feeling.

* * *

Fine things were to follow this Handel last evening, but nothing finer nor anything as satisfying. For in the prelude to "Lohengrin," though we might admire Mr. Koussewitsky's firm yet subtle modeling of the long crescendo and diminuendo which, both technically and esthetically, constitutes the form of this piece, the orchestra was guilty of inadvertences which blemished the performance.

And brilliant though was the reading and the playing of "Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche," it did not alter a belief that Mr. Koussewitsky is less than the ideal conductor of Strauss. This music, because it is of our times, Mr. Koussewitsky treats impressionistically, disintegrating the unity of its design, the fusion of its colors, painting it in thematic and coloristic fragments in space, so that it seems confused and sometimes inconsistent.

Even that triumphant proclamation of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony with which the program concluded, and which drew from the audience the most vivid demonstration of the evening, did not, in its adjustment of manner to matter on the part of the interpreting orchestra and conductor, impress one as unexceptionally just. Mr. Koussewitsky, as an interpreter of Beethoven leaves, even more than Mr. Koussewitsky as an interpreter of Strauss, something to be desired.

* * *

It was in the Handel Concerto, too, that last evening the orchestra itself revealed its potency. Before long it may be that this band will regain that position which it enjoyed many years ago when Dr. Karl Muck was its leader and genius. Its deterioration during the later years of the war and the earlier years of peace was at the time lamented. But Mr. Koussewitsky, an autocrat and a disciplinarian, has, during the five seasons of his intendantship, brought about the restoration to the Boston Symphony Orchestra of many of its departed glories. It is today a splendid instrument upon which masterpieces may fittingly be performed—an instrument capable of all the simplicities and subtleties of virtuosity, an orchestra which rivals, though it may not yet surpass, the most celebrated similar organizations in this country and abroad.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD

Music

By Samuel Chotzinoff

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall, 2.30.
Concerto Gross for strings, Op. 6, No. 10 .....Handel
The Enchanted Isle.....Louis Gruenberg
First Time in New York.
Symphony No. 6, in B Minor (pathetic), Tchaikowsky

I was rather surprised, as many in yesterday's Boston Symphony audience must have been, at the quality of Mr. Louis Gruenberg's symphonic poem, "The Enchanted Isle," which Mr. Koussevitzky introduced to New York.

Mr. Gruenberg in recent years has acquired a reputation as a strong left-winger and one was led to expect that his new piece would prove a modernist shocker. Instead of which "The Enchanted Isle," as the Bostonians unfolded it, was neither horrific nor even startling, but proved to be a good old-fashioned narrative piece, nicely put together and exuding the faint but recognizable perfumes used by Ravel, Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Richard Strauss.

However, the whole business was cleared up by a program note in the Boston Orchestra's little booklet. This contained a confession from Mr. Gruenberg that the "Enchanted Isle" was conceived during the World War, subsequently put away in moth balls and only recently exhumed. Mr. Gruenberg also stated that he did not care to divulge what enchanted isles, if any, he had had in mind, and recommended his composition to his audiences as pure music only. Yesterday's audience took the music to its bosom and demanded Mr. Gruenberg in the flesh.

I thought that Mr. Koussevitzky in his presentation of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" symphony was guilty of overdoing the pessimism this work is said to celebrate. Certainly the theme of the Allegro non Troppo, which is first sounded lugubriously in the opening adagio, is not nearly so emotional as the Boston leader would have us believe. It seemed to me that this procedure spilled the melancholy beans right at the outset. Yet Mr. Koussevitzky, being a Russian, can be depended on to put the necessary pathos in the "Pathetique." An audience which filled the house se its approval on the Tschaikowsky an the other music of the afternoon.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph

Boston Symphony In Concert

by Charles D. Isaacson

THE greatest orchestra in America, probably in the world today, arrived in New York, Thursday evening, from down New England way.

In other words, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played its first concert in its metropolitan season at Carnegie Hall. When the Massachusetts aggregation is so termed, I am basing the opinion entirely on the general qualities of performance, from a purely orchestral angle, as I might speak of one pipe organ being the superior of all others in its class, or as I might declare a certain violin the greatest of fiddles, or even as I might offer the opinion that an automobile was the matchless paragon of all vehicles which move on wheels.

Credit to Koussevitzky

HOW much one must credit Dr. Serge Koussevitzky for the present status of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not difficult to decide. Always a precious company of players, the instrument has been perfected by the Russian conductor, during his five years of conscientious leadership.

"Til Eulenspiegel" of Richard Strauss fairly flowed with the multicolored hues of a deep river, under overhanging, aged oak trees, in Autumn late afternoon.

Polite and Decorus

YET something lacked. "Til" was scarcely the devilish, helter-skelter rogue of anticipation. Unlike the Irishman who stuck up his fingers at the policeman and forgot to remove his nose, this Eulenspiegel was more to be compared to the heroine of Meredith's "Egoist," who was termed a "rogue in porcelain." I am afraid that the rascal of Dr. Koussevitzky's imagination, dressed in too sombre clothes and rarely if ever took to his (hell, not to mention scampering behind corners. Compared to the Straussian idea, the performance To was comparable to a Bostonized ti version of "A Wonderful Night," overly polite and decorous.

As far as the Beethoven works, one could feel satisfied with the Koussevitzky interpretation, save in the latter half; yet the finale glowed in sheer splendor, through the majestic sweep of the Boston conductor, which always leaves behind a trail of golden emblazonment.

The novelty of the program, and the one in which Koussevitzky's individuality was most clearly demonstrated, was the "Mother Goose" Suite of Ravel, recently celebrated by his earth-shaking "Bolero." Here is writing of the most sophisticated order, extremely individual, never dull and always fascinating. I am afraid that the children for whom Ravel's pieces are written are the Boston youngsters commonly pictured by comic artists when caricaturing he Hub of the Universe.

Smart enough to discuss algebra and the Greek myths, they would never indulge in vulgar sports: their gloves in immaculate whiteness, their skirts starched or their trousers creased to the taste of the boulevard, they might easily listen with delight to the Ravel music. "Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty," "Hop o' My Thumb" (in search of crumbs to trace his path, all bewildered and lost), "Conversations of the Beauty and the Beast" (the monster in bassoon voice, answering the lovely clarionet), "The Fairy Garden" (for some reason made to resound like a Boston subway trolley turning a corner) and "Laideronnette, Empress of the Pagodes."

I mention the "Empress" last, though she comes third in the Suite's continuity. Loveliest of all, divulging a perfect shimmering Chinese lake, where harps and bells and strings glisten, I found the theme unwittingly a complete reproduction of an old Chinese song.

In New-York Ears

Hans Nov. '29

Koussevitzky's "Till"

ON Thursday and Saturday last, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra were heard for the first times this season in New York. On the evening program stood Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." In The Sun Mr. Henderson praised the performance warmly, saying

What was more impressive was the magnificent performance of the tone-poem. There was not a thematic fragment that did not seem to fall spontaneously and perfectly in to its place in the shimmering web of orchestration. Such a fastidious observance of proportion is not common and it bespoke not only earnest rehearsal but ideal communication between conductor and players. The scheme of development carried the interpretation from a whispering pianissimo to the thunderous and crushing forte which sent Till squeaking to his doom.

All was luminous and vivid, vital and yet touched with that strain of tenderness without which any reading of "Till Eulenspiegel" must fall short of the composer's intent. In short, it was a masterly presentation of a composition which has often been played admirably, sometimes superlatively, but assuredly never with a more sweeping gamut of orchestral splendors, never with a firmer outlining of its design, than last evening. The Boston Symphony Orchestra not only returned to town but to its golden era.

And Ravel

For his part, Mr. Thompson of The Evening Post was more pleased with Dr. Koussevitzky's version of Ravel's "Mother-Goose" pieces: "If it's modern music—that is, modern French music—or, to be more specific, the music of Maurice Ravel—provided the particular Ravel work is none other than 'Ma Mere l'Oye'—give us the Boston Symphony conducted by Serg Koussevitzky, just as we had it in the first of the ten concerts Boston is contributing to the welfare of those who congregate in Carnegie Hall. Momentarily, we may not be quite so sure about Beethoven, and even less certain about Richard Strauss.

"But when Mr. Koussevitzky was fairly into the 'Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty,' that is the first of the 'Mother-Goose' pieces, there was never a doubt with us as to the pre-eminence of the Bostonians in this music. Perhaps it is not the most difficult music in the world to play. But such gossamer delicacy as that which whispered the spell about 'La Belle au Bois Dormant' is certainly not easy of attainment, or it would not be such a rarity in the concert-halls. It is permissible to be a little weary of 'The Conversations of Beauty and the Beast,' but 'Le Jardin Féerique' regained a charm that, for us, had all but vanished from it until the Boston conductor waved his thaumaturgic wand and bade it return."

Continued on Following Page

In New-York Ears

Continued from Preceding Page

Also Beethoven

The concert ended with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. Hearing it, Mr Perkins of The Tribune Herald was quick with praise. In preceding concerts [he writes] Mr. Koussevitzky showed that he could avoid the risk of treating Beethoven's Fifth Symphony as a matter of course, and did so again in a vigorous, fresh performance of marked color and no lack of brilliance. There was much contrast, with assertive climaxes and, occasionally, a touch of stridency, but it was a vivid interpretation, suggesting that the Russian conductor and his musicians were offering this Symphony owing to their interest in it, rather than from a sense of duty.

But Hardly Gruenberg

On Saturday afternoon, Mr. Grünberg's tone-poem, "The Enchanted Isle" —the one novel number at the two concerts—had none too good a press. Only The Times thought highly of the piece. The other reviewers of a Sunday were lukewarm—as witnesses this paragraph from The Herald Tribune: "Listening to Mr. Grünber's work one could not but fancy that his enchanted island had been visited before he arrived there. One has heard accounts suspiciously like that of Mr. Grünberg concerning an enchanted island known to Ravel and to Debussy. But this is not to be wondered at. As a great philosopher once observed, 'our new thoughts have thrilled dead bosoms,' Mr. Grünberg's thoughts, as expressed in this music, are often beautiful and poetic and are set forth by an orchestra that knows how to make the sense of enchantment audible and persuasive. Mr. Grünberg is an able craftsman and his instruments obviously tell us what he wished them to say to us. Mr. Koussevitzky gave the work a devoted and eloquent performance, and at its conclusion he summond the composer to the stage to share with him the plaudits of the audience."

Dr. C. Gott Heads Tufts

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING SUN

NOV 25

Boston Symphony in Novelty

Louis Gruenberg's 'The Enchanted Isle' Given in Program at Carnegie Hall.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The first matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which blessed Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon, presented for public delectation Handel's concerto grosso now listed as opus 6, No. 10, Louis, Louis Gruenberg's symphonic poem "The Enchanted Isle" and Tschaikowsky's battered and conductor worn "Symphonie Pathetique." The central number was a novelty and was first performed at the Worcester festival on October 3, 1929, under Albert Stoessel. It was cordially welcomed to New York Saturday and Mr. Gruenberg, who now resides in this city, was called to the stage to accept the congratulations of the public.

When the great war was going on Mr. Gruenberg projected, as he tells us, four tone poems with no other purpose (could there be a better one?) than to make the world a more agreeable place than it was just then. He did not finish any save one. At a later time he found the unfinished score of the work heard Saturday and had a longing to "recapture a whiff of these enchanted islands of memory," a most natural desire and a logical foundation for imaginative and emotional music.

There is something of fancy, something of feeling, and something of ardent aspiration in the symphonic poem. It is the best music of Mr. Gruenberg's we have heard because it is less open in its search after superficial effect and more direct in its endeavor to say anything. There are some lovely pages and there are some utterances in the modern harmonies which possess exceptionally fine texture and artistic combination of instrumental color.

The thematic ideas upon which the composition are reared are not of supreme importance. Few musicians are producing pregnant thematic matter at this time, but some are capable of developing imposing structures from slight foundations. One has to be a genius to do this, and Mr. Gruenberg has not accomplished it, but he has written an interesting composition which has well-defined mood and real musical quality, but which does not, it seems to us, wholly open the door to the secret chamber of the composer's dream. The work was ravishingly played by the men from Boston. Without their marvelous witchery of tone most of the musical impression of the composer would have been lost. Mr. Koussevitzky gave the score a sympathetic, even affectionate, reading.

The Handel concerto grosso employs a very small concertina, but that of Saturday, consisting of Messrs. Burgin and Theodorowitch, violins, and Bedetti, cello, was distinguished. The body of tone produced by the tutti was superb in its suavity, depth and mellowness. These respected concerti, which have the dignity of age, have also the spirit of perennial youth. They belong to Keats's collection of things of beauty which are joys forever.

The "Pathetic" symphony continues to provoke commendation and there are reiterated pleas for recognition of its greatness. This is a matter which the writer does not mean to discuss at this moment.

But in spite of the outward splendor of Tschaikowsky's musical cry of despair it will probably become an accepted doctrine some day that the loftiest delineative music is that which breathes the highest thought, and which, instead of bewailing our common mortality and the terrors of the grave, concerns itself with the things which have made greatness of the spirit.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING POST

NOV 25 1929

MUSIC

By Richard L. Stokes

HAVING won to a conviction that the future of music lies in the United States rather than Europe, Mr. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is notable for his hospitality toward American composers. And so, during his Saturday afternoon concert at Carnegie Hall, he presented for the first time in this city a symphonic poem, entitled "The Enchanted Isle," by Louis Gruenberg. Though born in Russia, Mr. Gruenberg was translated to Brooklyn at the age of two.

For the sake of their own progress, it is essential that writers of music should know how their compositions sound, when played by first-rate orchestras under accomplished interpreters. It is in that function that Mr. Koussevitzky, and Mr. Stokowski also, are valuably serving the cause of musical education in this country. For Mr. Toscanini American music does not exist.

"The Enchanted Isle" was first performed at the seventieth annual festival of the Worcester County Musical Association on Oct. 3, last, under the direction of Albert Stoessel. It is a revision of a work projected during the war and forgotten by the composer for eight years, until he discovered it while rummaging in a bale of manuscripts.

It is possible that the symphonic poem is not long for this world. But it could be heard with pleasure. Many compositions of the day are stark and dry. The veins of Mr. Gruenberg's music teem with sap. In addition to the command of orchestral pigmentation which he shares with most of his contemporaries, he had things of interest and even poetry to say. The score possessed atmosphere, and discernible effects of the magic announced by the title. It was principally when Mr. Gruenberg undertook formal melody that his muse became lacking in distinction and invention.

Mr. Koussevitzky's program included further the tenth (D Minor) of Handel's twelve grand concertos for strings, and Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" symphony. I felt that the former would have gained in delicacy if the leader had reduced his string orchestra by at least a third, and that the reading, full of beautiful strokes of detail, had too obvious an air of painstaking and circumspection. The profusion of sentiment and care lavished upon the symphony betrayed only too sadly its inferiority to the classic models. For tone and skill, the orchestra was in admirable form.

Taylor's "Jurgen" Tuesday night, and Serge Koussevitzky countered Saturday afternoon with a first-time novelty in "The Enchanted Isle" of Louis Gruenberg, brought out at the recent Worcester festival but new to Manhattan. "The Enchanted Isle" is an early work by the composer of "The Daniel Jazz," revised and rescored. Originally it was a companion tone poem of "The Hill of Dreams," which the New York Symphony played some years ago. There were to have been two more of a set of four, but they were never finished.

"The Enchanted Isle" is coloristic and atmospheric, after the fashion of a number of composers who possibly influenced Mr. Gruenberg more than he realized. Ravel, Debussy, Scriabin, a little of Stravinsky are more recognizable than anything that says very positively "this is Gruenberg." There are some charming effects, but the work leaves the impression of slender and not very individual content, unduly protracted for effects' sake. Mr. Gruenberg was present and took his share of bows after a very fine performance of his work. Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra also did nobly by a Handel Concerto Grosso (No. 10 of Op. 6), and are to be thanked for a projection of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony that was beautifully molded and of golden tone.

By Oscar Thompson

...ms Sung by the Fr...
...lays Ameri... had rom trasf sho egie ca T ung n th not, fi ived che w w at 136

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAM

A novelty for New York on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Saturday matinee at Carnegie Hall was a symphonic poem by Louis Gruenberg entitled "The Enchanted Isle." Before this skillfully orchestrated piece, Mr. Koussevitzky directed a performance of Handel's Concerto Grosso for strings, op. 6, No. 10. The remainder of the program was devoted to Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph
NOV 13

Boston Symphony In Concert

by Charles D. Isaacson

THE greatest orchestra in America, probably in the world today, arrived in New York, Thursday evening, from down New England way.

In other words, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played its first concert in its metropolitan season at Carnegie Hall. When the Massachusetts aggregation is so termed, I am basing the opinion entirely on the general qualities of performance, from a purely orchestral angle, as I might speak of one pipe organ being the superior of all others in its class, or as I might declare a certain violin the greatest of fiddles, or even as I might offer the opinion that an automobile was the matchless paragon of all vehicles which move on wheels.

Credit to Koussevitzky

HOW much one must credit Dr. Serge Koussevitzky for the present status of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not difficult to decide. Always a precious company of players, the instrument has been perfected by the Russian conductor, during his five years of conscientious leadership.

"Til Eulenspiegel" of Richard Strauss fairly flowed with the multicolored hues of a deep river, under overhanging, aged oak trees, in Autumn late afternoon.

Polite and Decorus

YET something lacked. "Til" was scarcely the devilish, helter-skelter rogue of anticipation. Unlike the Irishman who stuck up his fingers at the policeman and forgot to remove his nose, this Eulenspiegel was more to be compared to the heroine of Meredith's "Egoist," who was termed a "rogue in porcelain." I am afraid that the rascal of Dr. Koussevitzky's imagination, dressed in too sombre clothes and rarely if ever took to his [illegible] hell, not to mention scampering behind corners. Compared to the Straussian idea, the performance was comparable to a Bostonized version of "A Wonderful Night," overly polite and decorous.

As far as the Beethoven works, one could feel satisfied with the Koussevitzky interpretation, save in the latter half; yet the finale glowed in sheer splendor, through the majestic sweep of the Boston conductor, which always leaves behind a trail of golden emblazonment.

The novelty of the program, and the one in which Koussevitzky's individuality was most clearly demonstrated, was the "Mother Goose" Suite of Ravel, recently celebrated by his earth-shaking "Bolero." Here is writing of the most sophisticated order, extremely individual, never dull and always fascinating. I am afraid that the children for whom Ravel's pieces are written are the Boston youngsters commonly pictured by comic artists when caricaturing he Hub of the Universe.

Smart enough to discuss algebra and the Greek myths, they would never indulge in vulgar sports: their gloves in immaculate whiteness, their skirts starched or their trousers creased to the taste of the boulevard, they might easily listen with delight to the Ravel music. "Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty," "Hop o' My Thumb" (in search of crumbs to trace his path, all bewildered and lost), "Conversations of the Beauty and the Beast" (the monster in bassoon voice, answering the lovely clarionet), "The Fairy Garden" (for some reason made to resound like a Boston subway trolley turning a corner) and "Laideronnette, Empress of the Pagodes."

I mention the "Empress" last, though she comes third in the Suite's continuity. Loveliest of all, divulging a perfect shimmering Chinese lake, where harps and bells and strings glisten, I found the theme unwittingly a complete reproduction of an old Chinese song.

In New-York Ears

Trans Nov. '29

Koussevitzky's "Till"

ON Thursday and Saturday last, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra were heard for the first times this season in New York. On the evening program stood Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." In The Sun Mr. Henderson praised the performance warmly, saying:

> What was more impressive was the magnificent performance of the tone-poem. There was not a thematic fragment that did not seem to fall spontaneously and perfectly in to its place in the shimmering web of orchestration. Such a fastidious observance of proportion is not common and it bespoke not only earnest rehearsal but ideal communication between conductor and players. The scheme of development carried the interpretation from a whispering pianissimo to the thunderous and crushing forte which sent Till squeaking to his doom.
>
> All was luminous and vivid, vital and yet touched with that strain of tenderness without which any reading of "Till Eulenspiegel" must fall short of the composer's intent. In short, it was a masterly presentation of a composition which has often been played admirably, sometimes superlatively, but assuredly never with a more sweeping gamut of orchestral splendors, never with a firmer outlining of its design, than last evening. The Boston Symphony Orchestra not only returned to town but to its golden era.

And Ravel

For his part, Mr. Thompson of The Evening Post was more pleased with Dr. Koussevitzky's version of Ravel's "Mother-Goose" pieces: "If it's modern music—that is, modern French music—or, to be more specific, the music of Maurice Ravel—provided the particular Ravel work is none other than 'Ma Mere l'Oye'—give us the Boston Symphony conducted by Serg Koussevitzky, just as we had it in the first of the ten concerts Boston is contributing to the welfare of those who congregate in Carnegie Hall. Momentarily, we may not be quite so sure about Beethoven, and even less certain about Richard Strauss.

"But when Mr. Koussevitzky was fairly into the 'Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty,' that is the first of the 'Mother-Goose' pieces, there was never a doubt with us as to the pre-eminence of the Bostonians in this music. Perhaps it is not the most difficult music in the world to play. But such gossamer delicacy as that which whispered the spell about 'La Belle au Bois Dormant' is certainly not easy of attainment, or it would not be such a rarity in the concert-halls. It is permissible to be a little weary of 'The Conversations of Beauty and the Beast,' but 'Le Jardin Féerique' regained a charm that, for us, had all but vanished from it until the Boston conductor waved his thaumaturgic wand and bade it return."

Continued on Following Page

In New-York Ears

Continued from Preceding Page

Also Beethoven

The concert ended with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. Hearing it, Mr Perkins of The Tribune Herald was quick with praise. In preceding concerts [he writes] Mr. Koussevitzky showed that he could avoid the risk of treating Beethoven's Fifth Symphony as a matter of course, and did so again in a vigorous, fresh performance of marked color and no lack of brilliance. There was much contrast, with assertive climaxes and, occasionally, a touch of stridency, but it was a vivid interpretation, suggesting that the Russian conductor and his musicians were offering this Symphony owing to their interest in it, rather than from a sense of duty.

But Hardly Gruenberg

On Saturday afternoon, Mr. Grünberg's tone-poem, "The Enchanted Isle"—the one novel number at the two concerts—had none too good a press. Only The Times thought highly of the piece. The other reviewers of a Sunday were lukewarm—as witnesses this paragraph from The Herald Tribune: "Listening to Mr. Grünber's work one could not but fancy that his enchanted island had been visited before he arrived there. One has heard accounts suspiciously like that of Mr. Grünberg concerning an enchanted island known to Ravel and to Debussy. But this is not to be wondered at. As a great philosopher once observed, 'our new thoughts have thrilled dead bosoms,' Mr. Grünberg's thoughts, as expressed in this music, are often beautiful and poetic and are set forth by an orchestra that knows how to make the sense of enchantment audible and persuasive. Mr. Grünberg is an able craftsman and his instruments obviously tell us what he wished them to say to us. Mr. Koussevitzky gave the work a devoted and eloquent performance, and at its conclusion he summond the composer to the stage to share with him the plaudits of the audience."

Dr. C. Gott Heads Tufts

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING SUN
NOV 25 1929

136

Boston Symphony in Novelty

Louis Gruenberg's 'The Enchanted Isle' Given in Program at Carnegie Hall.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The first matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which blessed Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon, presented for public delectation Handel's concerto grosso now listed as opus 6, No. 10, Louis, Louis Gruenberg's symphonic poem "The Enchanted Isle" and Tschaikowsky's battered and conductor worn "Symphonie Pathetique." The central number was a novelty and was first performed at the Worcester festival on October 3, 1929, under Albert Stoessel. It was cordially welcomed to New York Saturday and Mr. Gruenberg, who now resides in this city, was called to the stage to accept the congratulations of the public.

When the great war was going on Mr. Gruenberg projected, as he tells us, four tone poems with no other purpose (could there be a better one?) than to make the world a more agreeable place than it was just then. He did not finish any save one. At a later time he found the unfinished score of the work heard Saturday and had a longing to "recapture a whiff of these enchanted islands of memory," a most natural desire and a logical foundation for imaginative and emotional music.

There is something of fancy, something of feeling, and something of ardent aspiration in the symphonic poem. It is the best music of Mr. Gruenberg's we have heard because it is less open in its search after superficial effect and more direct in its endeavor to say anything. There are some lovely pages and there are some utterances in the modern harmonies which possess exceptionally fine texture and artistic combination of instrumental color.

The thematic ideas upon which the composition are reared are not of supreme importance. Few musicians are producing pregnant thematic matter at this time, but some are capable of developing imposing structures from slight foundations. One has to be a genius to do this, and Mr. Gruenberg has not accomplished it, but he has written an interesting composition which has well-defined mood and real musical quality, but which does not, it seems to us, wholly open the door to the secret chamber of the composer's dream. The work was ravishingly played by the men from Boston. Without their marvelous witchery of tone most of the musical impression of the composer would have been lost. Mr. Koussevitzky gave the score a sympathetic, even affectionate, reading.

The Handel concerto grosso employs a very small concertina, but that of Saturday, consisting of Messrs. Burgin and Theodorowitch, violins, and Bedetti, cello, was distinguished. The body of tone produced by the tutti was superb in its suavity, depth and mellowness. These respected concerti, which have the dignity of age, have also the spirit of perennial youth. They belong to Keats's collection of things of beauty which are joys forever.

The "Pathetic" symphony continues to provoke commendation and there are reiterated pleas for recognition of its greatness. This is a matter which the writer does not mean to discuss at this moment.

But in spite of the outward splendor of Tschaikowsky's musical cry of despair it will probably become an accepted doctrine some day that the loftiest delineative music is that which breathes the highest thought, and which, instead of bewailing our common mortality and the terrors of the grave, concerns itself with the things which have made greatness of the spirit.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAM
NOV 25 1929

A novelty for New York on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Saturday matinee at Carnegie Hall was a symphonic poem by Louis Gruenberg entitled "The Enchanted Isle." Before this skillfully orchestrated piece, Mr. Koussevitzky directed a performance of Handel's Concerto Grosso for strings, op. 6, No. 10. The remainder of the program was devoted to Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD

ing

[illegible] it is essential that writers of music should know how their compositions sound, when played by first-rate orchestras under accomplished interpreters. It is in that function that Mr. Koussevitzky, and Mr. Stokowski also, are valuably serving the cause of musical education in this country. For Mr. Toscanini American music does not exist.

"The Enchanted Isle" was first performed at the seventieth annual festival of the Worcester County Musical Association on Oct. 3, last, under the direction of Albert Stoessel. It is a revision of a work projected during the war and forgotten by the composer for eight years, until he discovered it while rummaging in a bale of manuscripts.

It is possible that the symphonic poem is not long for this world. But it could be heard with pleasure. Many compositions of the day are stark and dry. The veins of Mr. Gruenberg's music teem with sap. In addition to the command of orchestral pigmentation which he shares with most of his contemporaries, he had things of interest and even poetry to say. The score possessed atmosphere, and discernible effects of the magic announced by the title. It was principally when Mr. Gruenberg undertook formal melody that his muse became lacking in distinction and invention.

Mr. Koussevitzky's program included further the tenth (D Minor) of Handel's twelve grand concertos for strings, and Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" symphony. I felt that the former would have gained in delicacy if the leader had reduced his string orchestra by at least a third, and that the reading, full of beautiful strokes of detail, had too obvious an air of painstaking and circumspection. The profusion of sentiment and care lavished upon the symphony betrayed only too sadly its inferiority to the classic models. For tone and skill, the orchestra was in admirable form.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING POST
NOV 25 1929

Music : By Oscar Thompson

"German Requiem" of Brahms Sung by the Fri[illegible] —Koussevitzky Plays Americ[illegible]

UNTIL last week American music had been conspicuously absent from the programs of the major orchestras [illegible] ministering to assemblages in Carnegie Hall. But the season is still young, and there are signs and portents not to be waved aside. Stokowski revived Taylor's "Jurgen" Tuesday night, and Serge Koussevitzky countered Saturday afternoon with a first-time novelty in "The Enchanted Isle" of Louis Gruenberg, brought out at the recent Worcester festival but new to Manhattan. "The Enchanted Isle" is an early work by the composer of "The Daniel Jazz," revised and rescored. Originally it was a companion tone poem of "The Hill of Dreams," which the New York Symphony played some years ago. There were to have been two more of a set of four, but they were never finished.

"The Enchanted Isle" is coloristic and atmospheric, after the fashion of a number of composers who possibly influenced Mr. Gruenberg more than he realized. Ravel, Debussy, Scriabin, a little of Stravinsky are more recognizable than anything that says very positively "this is Gruenberg." There are some charming effects, but the work leaves the impression of slender and not very individual content, unduly protracted for effects' sake. Mr. Gruenberg was present and took his share of bows after a very fine performance of his work. Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra also did nobly by a Handel Concerto Grosso (No. 10 of Op. 6), and are to be thanked for a projection of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony that was beautifully molded and of golden tone.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N.Y. Times
NOV 24

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Koussevitzky Gives Novelty.

The novelty of the concert given by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall was the symphonic poem, "The Enchanted Isle," by Louis Gruenberg. The composer was present and after long-continued applause by the audience appeared on the stage, where with Mr. Koussevitzky he modestly acknowledged the recalls.

"The Enchanted Isle" is one of Mr. Gruenberg's earlier scores, one recently revised by him. "As I idly turned its pages," he tells us in Mr. Hale's program notes, "a theme here, a passage there gradually brought back to me the wistful romantic days of my youth, when all is well, even if it isn't. I grew sentimental and determined to recapture of a whiff of those enchanted islands of memory, gradually making a complete new score, retaining the emotions—most of the melodies of the original work—but making use of my newly acquired freedom, knowledge of orchestration, harmony and construction. And that sums up what 'The Enchanted Isle' represents in my artistic career today—a bridge between the old and the new."

The impression made by this music on the writer is curious and vivid. There is the sense not only of rich color but of a richly expressive nature back of the music—in other words, of a person born to compose. There are pages that move the listener—not entirely by their outward seeming, but in part because of their inner significance. Perhaps repeated hearings of a score in which there is often a high and fine quality of technic would make it clearer and more unified in effect. There is the sense of a message half delivered rather than of a work which completely conveys its original thought.

Perhaps, again, this sense of inward division instead of complete unity is in part due to the mental suggestion of Mr. Gruenberg's own statement that "The Enchanted Isle" is a recent and revised version of a work of earlier years. Would it have been better for the composer to have let his more youthful music entirely alone? What would have been the effect of "The Enchanted Isle," whatever its immaturities may have been, if heard in its original form?

The themes as heard yesterday are perhaps derivative in character and not very original. They have, however, juice, freshness and feeling. The treatment they are given, expert as it is, seems anachronistic. Often this treatment is interesting; no doubt it has in many places toned up harmonic color and the general style of the composition. But the sense remains of incongruities of inspiration and style, and there is the question of the cohesion and balance of the different sections of the work.

The orchestral coloring is often gorgeous and distinctive. It materially enhances the effect of the musical thought. It was high time that a composer of Mr. Gruenberg's sincerity and his very considerable technical attainments should have been given performance by a conductor and orchestra of the highest rank. The composer must have been delighted by the interpretation of his work, which pleased the audience. This performance was but one of the many distinguished services which Mr. Koussevitzky has done for American music.

There was a very fine performance of the Handel Concerto grosso, No. 10, in D minor. Mr. Koussevitzky, himself a master of stringed instruments, secured not only the superbly fused and focussed string tone which distinguishes the Boston Symphony as a body, but he also draws that astonishing variety of color from his string body which none but an experienced executant as well as conductor knows how to secure. There was a whole orchestral color scheme in a work scored for strings alone. Now the tone was as full and warm as a brass choir, now it possessed the limpidness and transparency of the flute. What shall be said of the Air that makes the second movement, that tender and exalted phrase with which it opens and which Handel writes down as naturally as if it were his everyday speech, which, indeed it is? In passages "concertino" or "ripieno" the members of the orchestra played with the most admirable art.

Also it was an admirable thing to play again the Tchaikovsky "Pathetique" symphony, especially as Mr. Koussevitsky plays; for he is a master of the score and its secrets. There are those who hold the nose at the tears, the protestations, the frantic and hysterical outcries of Tchaikovsky, hymning the illusions, the hopes, the partings of life; fearing the King of Terrors who waits beyond. They call attention to his lack of esthetic discrimination, his ineptness of "form," and what they are pleased to term his "self-pity." In the first place this is wrong, since it is a far deeper and greater thing than pity for self which is unfolded in these tortured pages. In the second place it is difficult to sympathize with that species of snobism which can never give credit for sincerity or greatness when a man, as they say, "carries his heart on his sleeve."

Tchaikovsky was never a Beethoven, and never a man to set up concealments and defenses between himself and fellow-beings. But he was a very great composer, one with exceptional power of melodic invention and directness of address, a master of instrumentation, and a man who suffered much. He has written in his own way, and as no other composer before or since, of the life of man and the end of his desires. Nobody but precisely the weak, noble and lacerated person that Tchaikovsky was could have penned the terrible march, frantic, "battle-drunk," to which all the hosts of the earth, with banners flung to the wind, advance to the last great despair.

Who else could drape such sable over the orchestra in that elegy which alone would give Tchaikovsky his place among the immortals? But after all, words are superfluous before this music. It is great, human, and imperfect; it is pitiful, tender and desperate under merciless skies. It says, "And you too, brother? * * * Even as I."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph
NOV 26

Angna Enters C... Her Capers

Dancing Lady Tickles Risi... of Audience at Booth by V... of Sundry Poses and Poste...

By Charles D. Isaacson

Boston Symphony Heard

"THE ENCHANTED ISLE" of Louis Gruenberg turned out to be largely "Coney's Island," a recollection of Surf avenue, the Boardwalk and principally the amusement parks. The composer, who lives in Brooklyn en route to the famous resort, probably lost his original motif and caught the spirit of the carousel and the shouts of the barkers outside Steeplechase. At least that is the impression which I gathered from a hearing of the symphonic poem, presented for the first time in New York Saturday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall.

I must admit that the opening bars of Mr. Gruenberg's work, according to his own confession, "written to make a world pleasanter than the one existing," gave much promise. In fact, there was intimation of delights of an unusual order. Alas, scarcely had the original theme been enunciated than the composer lost the thread of his way, much as one does in Coney's mystic maze. Whereas the first measures were veiled in enchantment, a breath of breeze wafted from the warm, mythical seas and carrying the lilt of a mermaid's song or the echo of a gallant knight's serenade, what followed in the main was noisy and braggadocio.

Not until the final page of the poem had been turned by the first violin section did Gruenberg again catch the atmosphere he sought to paint. The composer of "Daniel Jazz" attempted to make an audience believe that there is some enchanted island past, present or future, where jazz and blues are permitted within its confines.

A Slight Let-Down

SO much for the composition; now what of its performance? Dr. Koussevitzky rendered unto it homage which was that of Caesar's. He treated the work with consideration, aye, with enthusiasm and, what is more important, respect.

When, after the Boston Symphony Orchestra played its Thursday night concert, I wrote, "This is the best orchestra in America," I meant it. Saturday afternoon one could not have recognized the appellation if he had listened solely to the first movement of the Handel Concerto Grosso which opened the concert. The first violin section was ragged and uneven and effects generally disappointing. If this were the greatest organization, then all we can suspect is that it had been out on a little party the night before and hadn't wakened as yet.

To be sure, the Boston Symphony Orchestra recovered itself. The program ended with a passionate reading of the Tschaikowsky "Pathetique" Symphony, in which Dr. Koussevitzky gave many evidences of his remarkable musical understanding and the players of that golden tone and fine precision of which we spoke the other morning.

Mr. Wohllebe's abilities as chorus master are beginning to have expression. The soloists, Mme. Rethberg and Mr. Tibbett, in the three arias, gave credence to the ideal of the Friends, which demands perfect, sensationless art. Mr. Bodanzky permitted the "Requiem" to pursue its soft, treadless, gentle way, sobbing its sorrow while glancing aloft in its perfect, unalloyed faith, the true exposition of religious solace and calm before death.

N.Y. EVENING POST. NOV. 22 '29

Music, Motion Pictu...

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Re-enter the Koussevitzkyans, Bringing With Them an Italicized Imp and a Gallic-Style Mother Goose

IF IT'S modern music—that is, modern French music—or, to be more specific, the music of Maurice Ravel—provided the particular Ravel work is none other than "Ma Mere l'Oye"—give us the Boston Symphony conducted by Serg Koussevitzky, just as we had it last night in the first of the ten concerts Boston is contributing to the welfare of those who congregate in Carnegie Hall. Momentarily, we may not be quite so sure about Beethoven, and even less certain about Richard Strauss.

But when Mr. Koussevitzky was fairly into the "Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty," that is the first of the "Mother Goose" pieces, there was never a doubt with us last night as to the pre-eminence of the Bostonians in this music.

Perhaps it is not the most difficult music in the world to play. But such gossamer delicacy as that which whispered of the spell about "La Belle au Bois Dormant" is certainly not easy of attainment, or it would not be such a rarety in the concert halls. It is permissible to be a little weary of "The conversations of Beauty and the Beast," but "Le Jardin Feerique" regained a charm that, for us, had all but vanished from it until the Boston conductor waved his thaumaturgic wand and bade it return.

Otherwise, this is a record of admirations mixed with dubieties. Mr. Koussevitzky was in a singing mood and we became more engrossed by his vocal pom-pom and tum-tum (his enunciation at least was remarkably good) than by the brilliantly brittle playing of the "Egmont" music.

The Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel" was, for us, particularized to the point of preciosity, and, though much of this meticulously italicized detail was in itself delectably Eulenspiegelish, the hearty gusto, the frank blurtings of a type of coarseness peculiarly that of Mittel-Europa, the abdominal rumblings which underlie the nasal quirks and quiritations of Till's "old-fashioned, roguish manner," were to be sought for in vain in Mr. Koussevitzky's highly individualized performance. We missed also the wistful sentiment customary in the meditations at the beginning and the close; the trombones pronounced their judgment with due weight of legal jurisprudence, but Till was hung by the neck with something less than the usual suggestion of a tear; whether of the beer garden or the haunts of the crocodile let the Muenchener who so deftly wrought the little epilogue finally say. We still like "Till." But we like him best when he is worst; an overrefined imp may come to be no imp at all.

Tonally, the Bostonians were not in their highest estate, but this is not yet mid-season. If there were some rough places that were not made plain in the Fifth Symphony, the ensemble built its climaxes with the Koussevitzky clan; and in its essential spirit this was one of the most gratifying readings of a major Beethoven work the Boston conductor has given us. But to revert to first preferences, our modest mite of contributor's kudos must be bestowed particularly upon the "Mother Goose" Ravel. A brilliant audience had enthusiasms to spare for all that the evening adduced. Standees reached the maximum number, and many appetent ones were turned away.

York Hotel, commended all concerned, including the Canadian Pacific Railway, saying that "when a business corporation turns to human history it stirs the heart to dreams." Such an enterprise, promoted by the railroad, is important, he said, for Canada's future.

He hoped that the new consideration given old English music would inspire present composers to make music "not too high for our heads nor too low for our souls," because music must doff its tall hat and appeal to the average man. The layman must be recaptured. Music must be written for the people, for them to play and sing and for their dances. The real composers must take possession of our jazz, our phonographs, our radio, as Haydn and Mozart took possession of the common music in their time.

"Music must come back into everyday life. Too long we have treated our composers as Athens treated alien residents, giving them liberty and some honors, yet holding them aloof. Music now stands for a professional career, something apart from common life. Why should an educated man congratulate himself upon having one dark chamber in his soul—no appreciation of music? Music should be understood as an expression as natural as speech, a thing infinitely subtle and delicate and founded on a profound, psychological law. It must not be torpid but recreative."

England, which 700 years ago gave the world what he called the first artistic music and had a record of five centuries of continuous creative work, as against four for Italy, three and one-half for Germany, and far less for France and Russia, has long shown "a curious partiality for the music of other nations," said Mr. McInnes, and her neglect of English composers has been shameful.

Even the mothers of English composers, according to Mr. McInnes, do not appreciate them. He and the composer, Ralph Vaughan Williams, were students together. The composer's mother gave a party for him, and Mr. McInnes was to sing. He placed on the program several of Williams's songs. Mrs. Williams wrote a deprecatory note, saying that surely they were not good enough and he had better take them off.

Gustav Holst, another English composer, was also a fellow student and was extremely poor. He was engaged to play the trombone in a town sixty miles away. He had to walk it, carrying the trombone in a green bag. Mr. McInnes walked along for fifteen miles.

Williams couldn't get an English publisher to take "A Sea Symphony." After seven years it brought $20. During the war English societies wishing to present Williams's music had to ask permission from the Germans, who had published it, and send the fees to people they were fighting.

Albert Coates of the London Symphony Orchestra told Mr. McInnes that in 1921, when he came to the United States, he was going to stake his reputation on Williams's "London Symphony," which did make a hit here. Mr. McInnes asked how he learned that the work existed. Mr. Coates replied that he had dropped in at the Royal College of Music and had heard students rehearsing it and had instantly appropriated the score.

HENRY BECKETT

N.Y. TIMES
Nov 22-'29

HOTELS AND RESTAURA

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Koussevitzky Scores Triumph.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra made their first New York appearance of the season last night in Carnegie Hall. The orchestra is more than ever a sheer delight and intoxication to the ear. The tone is of velvet or of gold, as the case may be. The orchestra is completely responsive to Mr. Koussevitzky's slightest wish.

On the program last night he placed the Beethoven "Egmont" overture, Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite, Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. The performance of the Ravel suite was the special triumph of the first part of the program. This is music of an artificial kind, but here the artifice is art. As we know, the suite when it was first composed was played four hands by two children. The orchestral version is more fascinating than the version for piano, since Ravel, a veritable wizard of instrumentation, can here employ all the most delicate tone colors and with a mastery which never fails to impress the listeners anew.

The score is full of the most delicate conceits. These are marvels of fastidious coloring. One wonders whether there has been another modern master with such a knowledge and instinct for the tone-tints of the orchestra. Debussy had this instinct, and a greater and more original talent than Ravel, but Ravel is the more precise of the two in his management of pigments. His children are Parisian children. They are not the apple-cheeked pair of Humperdinck. Nor do they belong to a hockey team or a folk-dance society. They inhabit drawing room and never go out to walk ungloved. Just the same, this is a delightful work of a highly finished and sophisticated sort. There is the flavor of the "contes bleues," even a suggestion of the medieval hinterland of the imagination from which they came. And all this was admirably conveyed by Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra.

As for Strauss, we have not heard "Till Eulenspiegel" played with more prevailing justness of pace and a finer molding of phrase and adjustment of detail. The scoring is very clean and clear, save in those places where Strauss is deliberately noisy and intentionally coarse. The performance made it the clearer. What was missing was the demoniac energy and defiance, the mad waggery, or the sudden haunting tenderness of the music with which Strauss himself, when he visited this country for the first time some twenty-five years ago, informed it. Perhaps distance lends enchantment to that visit, but it seemed music was never more highly charged and explosive, despite the poetry and the golden thread of folk-tale running through it.

Comparison of a conductor's interpretation with that of a composer does not, of course, necessarily establish standards, and comparison of Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting with that of Richard Strauss would be today highly disadvantageous to the latter gentleman. But the Till who fled Puck-like through the orchestra last night would not have alarmed and dismayed the bourgeois, would not have been summoned before the town council, denounced for his courageous misdeeds and indignantly strung up on the gallows. This Till was a harmless sprite. Boston would have harbored him with pleasure, and even Harvard. But Mr. O'Neill might have felt bored in his company.

There was a finely balanced and proportioned reading of the Beethoven overture, with the sombre chords that tower over the music of revolt, supplication, suspense—music which gives way at last to frantic rejoicing. Here, too, there could have been a more savage bite of the strings in the opening of the movement proper, a sharper thrust, a more passionate accent. The symphony is a work that Mr. Koussevitzky has shown, ere this, he can read in a nobly dramatic yet not slaviahly conventional manner.

N.Y. SUN-

IDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1929.

Boston Symphony Concert

Koussevitzky Includes Ravel Music in Initial Program for This Season.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra made their first local appearance of the season at Carnegie Hall last evening. The program was of substance. It began with Beethoven and ended with him. The first number was the "Egmont" overture, from which by use of the subtle art of transition Mr. Koussevitzky carried his auditors by way of Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye" to the merry pranks of Richard Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel." From this to Beethoven's fifth symphony was the next step, a rather long one to be sure, but it sufficed to bring the concert to a successful conclusion.

A program containing no novelty does not seem to call for prolonged discussion. There is always something to say about Ravel whose orchestral virtuosity lately aroused excitement when displayed in his "Bolero," but we suspect that despite the growing skepticism of flaming youth the fifth symphony will be performed before attentive listeners in far off years when "La Belle au Bois Dormant" cannot again be awakened. And nevertheless that is delightful music.

It possesses indefinable charm and a delicacy of fancy which are as rare as they are precious. It has, too, that aristocratic quality, that fine air of being "hoch geboren," which is to be found in all Ravel's music. Mr. Koussevitzky did not have to wait till last night to show music lovers that he was deeply in sympathy with this composer's ideals. He has lived too much in Paris and been too thoroughly saturated with the spirit of the Boulevard romanticism dominating all recent French art to be insensible to the individual nature of Ravel's creations.

But it was not in the elegant and highly polished fairy tale of Ravel that Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston musicians rose to commanding stature last evening. It was in the masterpiece of the German. One becomes more certain at each repetition that "Til Eulenspiegel" is the summit of Strauss's ascent with the orchestra. That vital fire of its content was always smoldering on the hearth of his genius is proved by the lovely bits which float through the score of "Der Rosenkavalier" and less prominent repetitions found in other later works. What Til has to do with the reflections of the Princess Werdenberg is more difficult to conjecture than the remote but perceptible connection between the rogue and Baron Ochs.

But this is a matter of no deep import. Every writer has his own pet forms and phrases. What was more impressive last night was the magnificent performance of the tone poem. There was not a thematic fragment that did not seem to fall spontaneously and perfectly into its place in the shimmering web of orchestration. Such a fastidious observance of proportion is not common and it bespoke not only earnest rehearsal but ideal communication between conductor and players. The scheme of development carried the interpretation from a whispering pianissimo to the thunderous and crushing forte which sent Til squeaking to his doom.

All was luminous and vivid, vital and yet touched with that strain of tenderness without which any reading of "Til Eulenspiegel" must fall short of the composer's intent. In short, it was a masterly presentation of a composition which has often been played admirably, sometimes superlatively, but assuredly never with a more sweeping gamut of orchestral splendors, never with a firmer outlining of its design, than last evening. The Boston Symphony Orchestra not only returned to town but to its golden era.

NG WORLD-
.22 1929

USIC

By Noel Straus

ll the soul to rage but did little to kindle soft requent outlet during the first evening concert ony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday. Mr. bod, rejoiced greatly in letting loose unstemmed olding pretty generally in abeyance the subtle ally called forth by his baton.

eethoven's ter's "Eg-ll Eulen-children's 'Ma Mere t the Bospations in of these "Egmont" cast-iron.
full sway ete anni-

dently spent the summer at the Ponce de Leon, for he sang with a surprising vigor and freshness of voice. This, with his superb finish and an art which knew the lamentable limitations of his present equipment, and restrained him from forcing his voice, made his presentation easily the outstanding event of the evening, particularly when it was backed up by acting of natural and easy grace.

Gigli was not in his wonted beauty of tone and when his throat lacked the ability to bring forth the notes of ravishing beauty which go so far to cloak his defects, he was, if the truth be told, somewhat a ridiculous figure. He sang without expression or color mination of the tenderer aspects of the score. By slurring over the latter, Mr. Koussevitzky failed to bring out the stirring emotional contrasts which lie at the root of this masterpiece. Arrived at the joyous culminating pages, the director gave vent to an uproarious din, in which overaccented brasses played an unbridled part.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony has often been better interpreted, but the imperishable composition probably never before sounded as noisy. All of its four movements remained dull, cumbersome and uninspiring. By skimping the tenuti of the portentous unisons in the first movement, lending nothing of mystery to the pianissimi of the development and slurring over the second subject in a way that left it devoid of meaning, Mr. Koussevitzky scarcely made a success of this section. There was no lightness at any point in the Scherzo, and therefore no adequate contrast could be made when the resounding Finale was reached, despite the terrific onslaughts of ugly tone that prevailed in this last division.

The essentially Germanic character of the music in Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" eluded the conductor almost entirely. Most of it was taken too briskly to satisfy the composer's intentions. And the irony, grotesque humor and romanticism inherent in the tone-poem simply flew out of the window. There was no give in the overhasty phrases of the love scene. Thus the florid sentimentality which Strauss introduced so wittily here fell to the ground. The hero's motive in the first horn was invariably accelerated toward its close, with ill effect, and the legendary atmosphere of the epilogue not so much as hinted at. As for the trial scene, the blaring of trombones and tuba in it might have depicted the end of the world, or some such cosmic cataclysm.

Although not remarkable for fairylike delicacy or fecund imagination, the rendition of the Ravel numbers was at least a relief from the thunderings of the rest of the evening's entertainment.

N.Y. WORLD
Nov 22-29

Music

By Samuel Chotzinoff

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall, 8.30 P. M.
Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven
Mother Goose Suite.....Ravel
Till Eulenspiegel.....Strauss
Symphony No. 5, in C Minor.....Beethoven

Last night the Boston Orchestra played for us in Carnegie Hall for the first time this season, and we noticed, as we did last fall and at the initial concert of every season since Mr., or rather Dr., Koussevitzky assumed the helm of the Bostonians, that the famous band was approaching closer to its pre-war excellence.

It must not be forgotten that it was considerably easier to achieve and maintain the position the Boston Symphony held in the old days, than it would be now when a good orchestra is the rule and not the exception. Where the old Boston had no real competitors it must face at the present moment two formidable rivals in the Philadelphia and the Philharl that the three emi-ns placed themselves

Carnegie Hall on suc-his week, making a gh probably uninvited,
ooves one to record,
last night's visitors e ordeal happily. One y the unanimity of aying of the Boston alized dynamic range, d a beautiful pianis-issimo free of noise, ion of a uniformly
ng tone.
of interpretation Mr.
sical desires appear the point of didacthe impression that ian knows what he,
mposer, wants. Thus,
" Overture and the C of Beethoven were t night in the forms cal documents, bril-
ut smelling of honest he symphony was, in g impersonation, full sometimes melodra-refaced appeals to the nsistence, perhaps an on the perpetual glare
At the very end of nt Mr. Koussevitzky ntic structure for a vent to a few plain-nish sighs, and he nale like a labor agidisaffected multitude eading a revival.

The Strauss Rondo was an altogether different story. Here Mr. Koussevitzky, sharing the composer's level, could give free reign to his imagination, and did so with stunning effect. Technically glamorous, his "Till Eulenspiegel" swept gorgeously through his merry pranks, and came, like Petrouchka, to a squealing end. It was an altogether memorable performance, and one which should make the bosoms of the Back Bay folks swell with justifiable pride.

N.Y. HERALD TRIBUNE

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1929

Orchestra From Boston Offers Concert Here

Capacity Audience Drawn to Carnegie Hall by Visit of Koussevitzky Musicians

Program Is Conservative

Matinee Features Gruenberg's 'Enchanted Isle'

By Francis D. Perkins

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the forty-ninth season of its distinguished career and the sixth under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, opened its first New York visit of the musical year with a concert last night in Carnegie Hall, which, even as on Tuesday for Mr. Stokowski's Philadelphia Orchestra and on Wednesday for Mr. Toscanini's Philharmonic-Symphony, attracted a capacity audience.

While Mr. Koussevitzky has the laudable reputation of an unusually receptive and catholic attitude toward contemporary music, he has proved on many previous occasions that he is not exclusively devoted to compositions of this century, and opened his New York season last night with a conservative program of well known works. He began and ended with Beethoven—the overture to Egmont and the Fifth Symphony—and completed his list with Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

The Boston Symphony, which, we are told, has made no changes in its personnel since last season, is a fine orchestra, and under its Russian director gives a unified, spirited and responsive performance. The string choir last night fell slightly short of achieving the polished song of the Philharmonic-Symphony strings, but its tone is enjoyable and capable of much color, and the high degree of this latter attribute was a general characteristic of last night's performance.

The "Egmont" overture was excellently played, and M. Ravel's "children's pieces" were agreeably performed in a somewhat placid vein. The orchestra began the Strauss tone poem in an easy going, what might be called a "gemutlich," mood, in marked contrast with the proclamative, vividly hued performance of the ensuing measures depicting Till's adventures, misadventures and regrettable end.

In his Carnegie Hall concerts of November, 1928, Mr. Koussevitzky showed that he could avoid the risk of treating Beethoven's Fifth Symphony as a matter of course, and did so last night in a vigorous, fresh performance of marked color and no lack of brilliance. There was much contrast, with assertive climaxes and, occasionally, a touch of stridency, but it was a vivid interpretation, suggesting that the Russian conductor and his musicians were offering this symphony owing to their interest in it, rather than from a sense of duty.

Tomorrow afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky will give the first New York performance of Louis Gruenberg's tone poem, "The Enchanted Isle," on a program with a Mandel Concerto Grosso and Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony.

138

N.Y. TIMES
NOV 22-29

HOTELS AND RESTAURA

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Koussevitzky Scores Triumph.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra made their first New York appearance of the season last night in Carnegie Hall. The orchestra is more than ever a sheer delight and intoxication to the ear. The tone is of velvet or of gold, as the case may be. The orchestra is completely responsive to Mr. Koussevitzky's slightest wish.

On the program last night he placed the Beethoven "Egmont" overture, Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite, Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. The performance of the Ravel suite was the special triumph of the first part of the program. This is music of an artificial kind, but here the artifice is art. As we know, the suite when it was first composed was played four hands by two children. The orchestral version is more fascinating than the version for piano, since Ravel, a veritable wizard of instrumentation, can here employ all the most delicate tone colors and with a mastery which never fails to impress the listeners anew.

The score is full of the most delicate conceits. These are marvels of fastidious coloring. One wonders whether there has been another modern master with such a knowledge and instinct for the tone-tints of the orchestra. Debussy had this instinct, and a greater and more original talent than Ravel, but Ravel is the more precise of the two in his management of pigments. His children are Parisian children. They are not the apple-cheeked pair of Humperdinck. Nor do they belong to a hockey team or a folk-dance society. They inhabit drawing room and never go out to walk ungloved. Just the same, this is a delightful work of a highly finished and sophisticated sort. There is the flavor of the "contes bleues," even a suggestion of the medieval hinterland of the imagination from which they came. And all this was admirably conveyed by Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra.

As for Strauss, we have not heard "Till Eulenspiegel" played with more prevailing justness of pace and a finer molding of phrase and adjustment of detail. The scoring is very clean and clear, save in those places where Strauss is deliberately noisy and intentionally coarse. The performance made it the clearer. What was missing was the demoniac energy and defiance, the mad waggery, or the sudden haunting tenderness of the music with which Strauss himself, when he visited this country for the first time some twenty-five years ago, informed it. Perhaps distance lends enchantment to that visit, but it seemed music was never more highly charged and explosive, despite the poetry and the golden thread of folk-tale running through it.

Comparison of a conductor's interpretation with that of a composer does not, of course, necessarily establish standards, and comparison of Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting with that of Richard Strauss would be today highly disadvantageous to the latter gentleman. But the Till who fled Puck-like through the orchestra last night would not have alarmed and dismayed the bourgeois, would not have been summoned before the town council, denounced for his courageous misdeeds and indignantly strung up on the gallows. This Till was a harmless sprite. Boston would have harbored him with pleasure, and even Harvard. But Mr. O'Neill might have felt bored in his company.

There was a finely balanced and proportioned reading of the Beethoven overture, with the sombre chords that tower over the music of revolt, supplication, suspense—music which gives way at last to frantic rejoicing. Here, too, there could have been a more savage bite of the strings in the opening of the movement proper, a sharper thrust, a more passionate accent. The symphony is a work that Mr. Koussevitzky has shown, ere this, he can read in a nobly dramatic yet not slavishly conventional manner.

THE

THURSDAY.

Breakfast.

Mixed fruit.
Ready-to-eat cereal.
Sausage. Raised muffins.
Coffee.

Dinner.

Hot mushroom canape.
Celery. Olives.
Salted nuts.
Turkey, cranberry sauce.
Mashed potatoes.
Cauliflower with special sauce.
Grapefruit salad.
Cheese balls.
Pumpkin tarts with honey.
Coffee.

Supper.

Sliced turkey sandwich.
Cranberry jelly.
Stuffed celery.
Cabbage salad.
Tea. Dundee cake.

FRIDAY.

Breakfast.

A program containing no novelty does not seem to call for prolonged discussion. There is always something to say about Ravel whose orchestral virtuosity lately aroused excitement when displayed in his "Bolero," but we suspect that despite the growing skepticism of flaming youth the fifth symphony will be performed before attentive listeners in far off years when "La Belle au Bois Dormant" cannot again be awakened. And nevertheless that is delightful music.

It possesses indefinable charm and a delicacy of fancy which are as rare as they are precious. It has, too, that aristocratic quality, that fine air of being "hoch geboren," which is to be found in all Ravel's music. Mr. Koussevitzky did not have to wait till last night to show music lovers that he was deeply in sympathy with this composer's ideals. He has lived too much in Paris and been too thoroughly saturated with the spirit of the Boulevard romanticism dominating all recent French art to be insensible to the individual nature of Ravel's creations.

But it was not in the elegant and highly polished fairy tale of Ravel that Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston musicians rose to commanding stature last evening. It was in the masterpiece of the German. One becomes more certain at each repetition that "Til Eulenspiegel" is the summit of Strauss's ascent with the orchestra. That vital fire of its content was always smoldering on the hearth of his genius is proved by the lovely bits which float through the score of "Der Rosenkavalier" and less prominent repetitions found in other later works. What Til has to do with the reflections of the Princess Werdenberg is more difficult to conjecture than the remote but perceptible connection between the rogue and Baron Ochs.

But this is a matter of no deep import. Every writer has his own pet forms and phrases. What was more impressive last night was the magnificent performance of the tone poem. There was not a thematic fragment that did not seem to fall spontaneously and perfectly into its place in the shimmering web of orchestration. Such a fastidious observance of proportion is not common and it bespoke not only earnest rehearsal but ideal communication between conductor and players. The scheme of development carried the interpretation from a whispering pianissimo to the thunderous and crushing forte which sent Til squeaking to his doom.

All was luminous and vivid, vital and yet touched with that strain of tenderness without which any reading of "Til Eulenspiegel" must fall short of the composer's intent. In short, it was a masterly presentation of a composition which has often been played admirably, sometimes superlatively, but assuredly never with a more sweeping gamut of orchestral splendors, never with a firmer outlining of its design, than last evening. The Boston Symphony Orchestra not only returned to town but to its golden era.

EVENING WORLD
NOV. 22 1929

MUSIC

By Noel Straus

CLAMOR that might swell the soul to rage but did little to kindle soft desire found far too frequent outlet during the first evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday. Mr. Koussevitzky, in rampant mood, rejoiced greatly in letting loose unstemmed floods of crass tone and holding pretty generally in abeyance the subtle tints and rich sonorities usually called forth by his baton.

The program comprised Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, that master's "Egmont" Overture, Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" and that set of five children's pieces by Ravel, known as "Ma Mere L'Oye." It cannot be said that the Boston leader lived up to anticipations in his unfolding of a single one of these familiar creations. The "Egmont" Overture was as unresilient as cast-iron. Goethe's tyrannical Alba held full sway in the reading, to the complete annihilation of the tenderer aspects of the score. By slurring over the latter, Mr. Koussevitzky failed to bring out the stirring emotional contrasts which lie at the root of this masterpiece. Arrived at the joyous culminating pages, the director gave vent to an uproarious din, in which overaccented brasses played an unbridled part.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony has often been better interpreted, but the imperishable composition probably never before sounded as noisy. All of its four movements remained dull, cumbersome and uninspiring. By skimping the tenuti of the portentous unisons in the first movement, lending nothing of mystery to the pianissimi of the development and slurring over the second subject in a way that left it devoid of meaning, Mr. Koussevitzky scarcely made a success of this section. There was no lightness at any point in the Scherzo, and therefore no adequate contrast could be made when the resounding Finale was reached, despite the terrific onslaughts of ugly tone that prevailed in this last division.

The essentially Germanic character of the music in Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" eluded the conductor almost entirely. Most of it was taken too briskly to satisfy the composer's intentions. And the irony, grotesque humor and romanticism inherent in the tone-poem simply flew out of the window. There was no give in the overhasty phrases of the love scene. Thus the florid sentimentality which Strauss introduced so wittily here fell to the ground. The hero's motive in the first horn was invariably accelerated toward its close, with ill effect, and the legendary atmosphere of the epilogue not so much as hinted at. As for the trial scene, the blaring of trombones and tuba in it might have depicted the end of the world, or some such cosmic cataclysm.

Although not remarkable for fairylike delicacy or fecund imagination, the rendition of the Ravel numbers was at least a relief from the thunderings of the rest of the evening's entertainment.

dently spent the summer at the Ponce de Leon, for he sang with a surprising vigor and freshness of voice. This, with his superb finish and an art which knew the lamentable limitations of his present equipment, and restrained him from forcing his voice, made his presentation easily the outstanding event of the evening, particularly when it was backed up by acting of natural and easy grace.

Gigli was not in his wonted beauty of tone and when his throat lacked the ability to bring forth the notes of ravishing beauty which go so far to cloak his defects, he was, if the truth be told, somewhat a ridiculous figure. He sang without expression or color

NEW YORK

F

O N'S COUNSEL

ld ibune are answered by the Rev. those inquiries which appear to be ught in the many letters he receives.

Ca

H. W. H. Myers in his poem "St. Paul makes the Apostle say:

"Saints, did I say? With your remembered faces,
Dear men and women whom I soug and slew,
Ah! when we mingle in the heaven places,
How will I weep to Stephen and you!"

Pr

The poet was evidently convinc that St. Paul would recall the cruelt of his persecuting days.

But unless I misapprehend yo question, its gist is that these u happy recollections may mar t tinguished career and the sixth under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, opened its first New York visit of the musical year with a concert last night in Carnegie Hall, which, even as on Tuesday for Mr. Stokowski's Philadelphia Orchestra and on Wednesday for Mr. Toscanini's Philharmonic-Symphony, attracted a capacity audience.

Ma

T the

While Mr. Koussevitzky has the laudable reputation of an unusually receptive and catholic attitude toward contemporary music, he has proved on many previous occasions that he is not exclusively devoted to compositions of this century, and opened his New York season last night with a conservative program of well known works. He began and ended with Beethoven—the overture to Egmont and the Fifth Symphony—and completed his list with Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

The Boston Symphony, which, we are told, has made no changes in its personnel since last season, is a fine orchestra, and under its Russian director gives a unified, spirited and responsive performance. The string choir last night fell slightly short of achieving the polished song of the Philharmonic-Symphony strings, but its tone is enjoyable and capable of much color, and the high degree of this latter attribute was a general characteristic of last night's performance.

The "Egmont" overture was excellently played, and M. Ravel's "children's pieces" were agreeably performed

N.Y. WORLD
NOV 22-29

Music

By Samuel Chotzinoff

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall, 8.30 P. M.

Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven
Mother Goose Suite.....Ravel
Till Eulenspiegel.....Strauss
Symphony No. 5, in C Minor.....Beethoven

Last night the Boston Orchestra played for us in Carnegie Hall for the first time this season, and we noticed, as we did last fall and at the initial concert of every season since Mr., or rather Dr., Koussevitzky assumed the helm of the Bostonians, that the famous band was approaching closer to its pre-war excellence.

It must not be forgotten that it was considerably easier to achieve and maintain the position the Boston Symphony held in the old days, than it would be now when a good orchestra is the rule and not the exception. Where the old Boston had no real competitors it must face at the present moment two formidable rivals in the Philadelphia and the Philharmonic-Symphony.

It so happened that the three eminent organizations placed themselves on exhibition in Carnegie Hall on succeeding nights this week, making a comparison, though probably uninvited, inevitable. It behooves one to record, therefore, that last night's visitors came through the ordeal happily. One admired especially the unanimity of attack in the playing of the Boston Orchestra, its equalized dynamic range, which encompassed a beautiful pianissimo and a fortissimo free of noise, and its acquisition of a uniformly healthy and glowing tone.

In the matter of interpretation Mr. Koussevitzky's musical desires appear to be definite to the point of didacticism, giving one the impression that the versatile Russian knows what he, rather than the composer, wants. Thus, both the "Egmont" Overture and the C Minor Symphony of Beethoven were shaped for us last night in the forms of highly theatrical documents, brilliantly executed, but smelling of honest grease paint. The symphony was, in fact, a compelling impersonation, full of dramatic and sometimes melodramatic gestures, barefaced appeals to the emotions and an insistence, perhaps an unconscious one, on the perpetual glare of the spotlight. At the very end of the first movement Mr. Koussevitzky held up the gigantic structure for a moment to give vent to a few plaintive, un-Beethovenish sighs, and he swung into the finale like a labor agitator exhorting a disaffected multitude or an evangelist leading a revival.

The Strauss Rondo was an altogether different story. Here Mr. Koussevitzky, sharing the composer's level, could give free reign to his imagination, and did so with stunning effect. Technically glamorous, his "Till Eulenspiegel" swept gorgeously through his merry pranks, and came, like Petrouchka, to a squealing end. It was an altogether memorable performance, and one which should make the bosoms of the Back Bay folks swell with justifiable pride.

138

Nov 24

THE NEW YORK TIMES, SU

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Koussevitzky Gives Novelty.

The novelty of the concert given by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall was the symphonic poem, "The Enchanted Isle," by Louis Gruenberg. The composer was present and after long-continued applause by the audience appeared on the stage, where with Mr. Koussevitzky he modestly acknowledged the recalls.

"The Enchanted Isle" is one of Mr. Gruenberg's earlier scores, more recently revised by him. "As I idly turned its pages," he tells us in Mr. Hale's program notes, "a theme here, a passage there gradually brought back to me the wistful romantic days of my youth, when all is well, even if it isn't. I grew sentimental and determined to recapture a whiff of these enchanted islands of memory, gradually making a complete new score, retaining the emotions—most of the melodies of the original work—but making use of my newly acquired freedom, knowledge of orchestration, harmony and construction. And that sums up what 'The Enchanted Isle' represents in my artistic career today—a bridge between the old and the new."

The impression made by this music on the writer is curious and vivid. There is the sense not only of rich color but of a richly expressive nature back of the music—in other words, of a person born to compose. There are pages that move the listener—not entirely by their outward sseming, but in part because of their inner significance. Perhaps repeated hearings of a score in which there is often a high and fine quality of technic would make it clearer and more unified in effect. There is the sense of a message half delivered rather than of a work which completely conveys its original thought.

Perhaps, again, this sense of inward division instead of complete unity is in part due to the mental suggestion of Mr. Gruenberg's own statement that "The Enchanted Isle" is a recent and revised version of a work of earlier years. Would it have been better for the composer to have let his more youthful music entirely alone? What would have been the effect of "The Enchanted Isle," whatever its immaturities may have been, if heard in its original form?

The themes as heard yesterday are perhaps derivative in character and not very original. They have, however, juice, freshness and feeling. The treatment they are given, expert as it is, seems anachronistic. Often this treatment is interesting; no doubt it has in many places toned up harmonic color and the general style of the composition. But the sense remains of incongruities of inspiration and style.

The orchestral coloring is often gorgeous and distinctive. It materially enhances the effect of the musical thought. It was high time that a composed of Mr. Gruenberg's sincerity and his very considerable technical attainments should have been given performance by a conductor and orchestra of the highest rank. The composer must have been delighted by the performance of his work, which pleased the audience. This performance was but one of the many distinguished services which Mr. Koussevitzky has done for American music.

There was a very fine performance of the Handel Concerto grosso, No. 10, in D minor. Mr. Koussevitzy, himself a master of stringed instruments, secured not only the superbly fused and focussed string tone which distinguishes the Boston Symphony as a body, but he also draws that astonishing variety of color from his string body which none but an experienced executant as well as conductor knows how to secure. There was a whole orchestral color scheme in a work scored for strings alone. Now the tone was as full and warm as a brass choir, now it possessed the limpidness and transparency of the flute. What shall be said of the air that makes the second movement, that tender and exalted phrase with which it opens and which Handel writes down as naturally as if it were his everyday speech, which, indeed it is? In passages "concertino" or "ripieno" the members of the orchestra played with the most admirable art.

Also it was an admirable thing to play again the Tchaikovsky "Pathetique" symphony, especially as Mr. Kousseviszky plays it; for he is a master of the score and its secrets. There are those who hold the nose at the tears, the protestations, the frantic and hysterical outcries of Tchaikovsky, hymning the illusions, the hopes, the partings of life, fearing the King of Terrors who waits beyond. They call attention to his lack of esthetic discriminations, his ineptness of "form," and what they are pleased to term his "self-pity." In the first place this is wrong, since it is a far deeper and greater thing than pity for self which is unfolded in these tortured pages. In the second place it is difficult to sympathize with that species of snobism which can never give credit for sincerity or greatness when a man, as they say, "carries his heart on his sleeve."

Tschaikowsky was never a Beethoven, and never a man to set up concealments and defenses between himself and fellow-beings. But he was a very great composer, one with exceptional power of melodic invention and directness of address, a master of instrumentation, and a man who suffered much. He has written in his own way, and as no other composer before or since, of the life of man, and the end of his desires. Nobody but precisely the weak, noble and lacerated person that Tschaikowsky was could have penned the terrible march, frantic, "battle-drunk," to which all the hosts of the earth, with banners flung to the wind, advance to the last great despair.

Who else could drape such sable over the orchestra in that elegy which alone would give Tschaikowsky his place among the immortals? But after all, words are superfluous before this music. It is great, human, and imperfect; it makes brothers of men.

N.Y. AMERICAN

NOVEMBER 22, 1929

...s Co-Stars

WELL-VARIED MUSIC PERFORMED BY THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

VARIETY was one of the spices of the programme presented last evening at Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky opened his annual series here with Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," and Beethoven's fifth symphony, the quartet of works representing an exceptionally well-balanced list.

Beethoven's "Egmont," with its proud sentiment and robustious passion, fared well at the hands of Koussevitzky. However, it did not garner the reptuous applause which followed his imaginative interpretation of Ravel's sensitive, fine-spun orchestral conceit.

The Russian conductor's communicative art was reflected brilliantly in the whimsical delivery, lovely colorings and fastidious feats of tone and technic with which he and his players invested their performance of Ravel's delicious piece of symphonic tomfoolery.

Moves at Vital Pace

The "Mother" skylarks innocently enough in comparison with "Eulenspiegel," whose rollickings, often criminally ribald, finally land him in the hangman's hands. Strauss gives you even the clarinet shrilling which denotes Till's last squeak choked forth by the rope.

Koussevitzky made the Strauss poem move at a vital pace but lost none of its pictorial fun and broad suggestiveness. It was a brilliant virtuoso achievement by the leader and his men.

Press exigencies permitted me to hear only the first movement of the Beethoven symphony, and I liked the rugged attack of the leading theme, the rhythmic precision in its developments, and the skilful blending of the dramatic and lyrical elements.

In spite of the deep philosophical import given to the first movement of the "Fifth" by wordy commentators, it remains one of the most transparently constructed pieces of writing in the entire realm of symphony. ...se conductors who try to

Nov. 25 - 1929

THE EVENING WORLD, MO

MUSIC

By Richard L. Stokes

HAVING won to a conviction that the future of music lies in the United States rather than Europe, Mr. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is notable for his hospitality toward American composers. And so, during his Saturday afternoon concert at Carnegie Hall, he presented for the first time in this city a symphonic poem, entitled "The Enchanted Isle," by Louis Gruenberg. Though born in Russia, Mr. Gruenberg was translated to Brooklyn at the age of two.

For the sake of their own progress, it is essential that writers of music should know how their compositions sound, when played by first-rate orchestras under accomplished interpreters. It is in that function that Mr. Koussevitzky, and Mr. Stokowski also, are valuably serving the cause of musical education in this country. For Mr. Toscanini American music does not exist.

"The Enchanted Isle" was first performed at the seventieth annual festival of the Worcester County Musical Association on Oct. 3, last, under the direction of Albert Stoessel. It is a revision of a work projected during the war and forgotten by the composer for eight years, until he discovered it while rummaging in a bale of manuscripts.

It is possible that the symphonic poem is not long for this world. But it could be heard with pleasure. Many compositions of the day are stark and dry. The veins of Mr. Gruenberg's music teem with sap. In addition to the command of orchestral pigmentation which he shares with most of his contemporaries, he had things of interest and even poetry to say. The score possessed atmosphere, and discernible effects of the magic announced by the title. It was principally when Mr. Gruenberg undertook formal melody that his muse became lacking in distinction and invention.

Mr. Koussevitzky's program included further the tenth (D Minor) of Handel's twelve grand concertos for strings, and Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" symphony. I felt that the former would have gained in delicacy if the leader had reduced his string orchestra by at least a third, and that the reading, full of beautiful strokes of detail, had too obvious an air of painstaking and circumspection. The profusion of sentiment and care lavished upon the symphony betrayed only too sadly its inferiority to the classic models. For tone and skill, the orchestra was in admirable form.

celebrated composition in 1867, the work comprised only the first three numbers of the present score. It was precisely in this initial triptych that chorus and orchestra, under Artur Bodanzky's direction, most nearly realized the mood of tender resignation underlying the composer's tribute to the memory of his mother.

After a resounding and impressive rendition of the great pedal fugue with which the original creation terminated, the interpretation partook more often of somnolence than solemnity. The choral and symphonic forces never lapsed from technical and tonal excellence. The dynamics of every phrase were meticulously observed and the architectural aspects of each of the seven sections were clearly set forth. But for all of the care expended on the interpretation, it somehow failed to become moving or impressive. Of the last four numbers, only the resurrection chorus came to life.

The reading began auspiciously with a sensitive conception of the opening chorus and a finely considered proclamation of the following funeral march in triple rhythm. The central episode in each of these divisions was skilfully contrasted with the main idea, and the contemplative measures of the march were admirably differentiated from the ensuing Allegro, which was forcefully announced.

The sleep-inducing proclivities of the performance saw their inception with the appearance of Lawrence Tibbett at the start of the third section. His baritone solos, here and later, were couched in tones so hollow and dead that they sounded like a voice from the tomb. But he boasted style and clear diction, which was more than could be said of Elisabeth Rethberg's single contribution. Mme. Rethberg was in better trim than at last week's concert of the society, though not in her best vocal estate. But her singing conveyed no definite message. The accompaniment of the first, second and last choruses would have been improved by the addition of an extra harp, as designated by the composer.

NOEL STRAUS.

NY World

Nov. 24

Music

By Samuel Chotzinoff

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall, 2:30.
Concerto Gross for strings, Op. 6, No. 10 ..... Handel
The Enchanted Isle ..... Louis Gruenberg
First Time in New York.
Symphony No. 6, in B Minor (pathetic), Tchaikowsky

I was rather surprised, as many in yesterday's Boston Symphony audience must have been, at the quality of Mr. Louis Gruenberg's symphonic poem, "The Enchanted Isle," which Mr. Koussevitzky introduced to New York.

Mr. Gruenberg in recent years has acquired a reputation as a strong left-winger and one was led to expect that his new piece would prove a modernist shocker. Instead of which "The Enchanted Isle," as the Bostonians unfolded it, was neither horrific nor even startling, but proved to be a good old-fashioned narrative piece, nicely put together and exuding the faint but recognizable perfumes used by Ravel, Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Richard Strauss.

However, the whole business was cleared up by a program note in the Boston Orchestra's little booklet. This contained a confession from Mr. Gruenberg that the "Enchanted Isle" was conceived during the World War, subsequently put away in moth balls and only recently exhumed. Mr. Gruenberg also stated that he did not care to divulge what enchanted isles, if any, he had had in mind, and recommended his composition to his audiences as pure music only. Yesterday's audience took the music to its bosom and demanded Mr. Gruenberg in the flesh.

I thought that Mr. Koussevitzky in his presentation of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" symphony was guilty of overdoing the pessimism this work is said to celebrate. Certainly the theme of the Allegro non Troppo, which is first sounded lugubriously in the opening adagio, is not nearly so emotional as the Boston leader would have us believe. It seemed to me that this procedure spilled the melancholy beans right at the outset. Yet Mr Koussevitzky, being a Russian, can be depended on to put the necessary pathos in the "Pathetique." An audience which filled the house set its approval on the Tschaikowsky and the other music of the afternoon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

SEP 14 1929

Musical ... Elmwood Music ... series of seven concerts.

Each orchestra is definitely expressive of its leader. When Serge Koussevitzky, who opens the series, Oct. 28, with the Boston Symphony, stands before his men, he is a figure of commanding presence, although not a large man. The range of devices by which Mr. Koussevitzky makes known his wishes to his orchestra is said to be practically without limit. And yet Mr. Koussevitzky knows how to remain within certain limits of poise. As an interpreter, Mr. Koussevitzky is a musician who loves the beauty of the sinuous, expressive melodic line, who knows how to mould it artfully and exquisitely, to draw from it its last secret of expressive effect.

Ossip Gab...lowitsch, who comes back ... of th...

WESTERN TRIP - 1929 -

BUFFALO - CHICAGO - PITTSBURG - INDIANAPOLIS - ST. PAUL - MINNEAPOLIS

140

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

THE earliest of the October musical events will be the recital by Marcel Dupre, concert organist, in the Church of the Atonement, Oct. 7. Arthur Pye, violinist, plays here the same week, in the Twentieth Century club.

Serge Koussevitzky, who begins the Buffalo Musical foundation's orchestra series Oct. 28, has just returned from Europe bringing with him interesting music for the orchestral repertoire.

Local organizations will figure actively in the season"s musical affairs.

* * *

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which plays in Elmwood Music hall Monday evening, Oct. 28, arrived in New York this week on the Ile de France, from Europe, full of plans for the season, and especially for next year, when the Boston Symphony celebrates its semi-centennial.

According to the Boston Evening Transcript, Mr. Koussevitzky has commissioned Igor Stravinsky and Serge Prokofieff to write works for this celebration, and it is planned to invite the first conductor of the orchestra, Sir George Henschel, who was in charge from 1881 to 1885, to come from England to conduct at least part of a concert program.

The Boston Symphony comes first in the Orchestra series under the auspices of the Buffalo Musical foundation, at Elmwood Music hall this year.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO
TIMES
OCT 6 - 1929

Boston Orchestra Will Open Series of Buffalo Musical

Opening its series with the Boston Symphony and with the Detroit Symphony and the Chicago scheduled, the Buffalo Musical Foundation predicts one of the most brilliant orchestral seasons in its history for the coming season at Elmwood Music Hall.

This will be Serge Koussevitzky's sixth season with the Boston Symphony and the 9th season of its existence.

He is of a line of brilliant conductors who have presided over the artistic destiny of the famous organization.

The Boston orchestra which opens the series, October 28, was founded and for 37 years sustained by the late Henry Lee Higginson.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER
OCT 13

Orchestral Series

"The young American composers are more interesting than the young Europeans. I much prefer the young Americans." Thus spake Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, upon his arrival recently in this country after another summer on the continent, much of which time was spent delving among the works of the "young Europeans."

Whether Koussevitzky will include any works by the "young Americans" on his list when he comes to Buffalo with the Boston forces on Monday evening, October 28th, auspices of the Buffalo Musical Foundation remains to be seen. The program will be announced later for this city.

Meantime, by way of illustrating what American composers can do, Mr. Koussevitzky will proffer this season, in his symphony course in Boston, a symphony by Aaron Copeland and tone poems by Werner Josten and Roger Sessions, all in their initial performances, together with a piece that has particularly struck the composer's fancy, Samuel Gardner's Broadway. There will be European novelties, also, not only by "young Europeans," but also by the established composers. For the first time, Boston will hear Mahler's Ninth Symphony and his Kindertotenlieder, a cycle of five songs with orchestra, also a concerto for wind instruments by Spohr.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER
OCT 20 1929

MUSIC

Koussevitzky With Boston Symphony

Playing the Beethoven Fifth Symphony, with which he opened this season in Symphony Hall, Boston, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program of remarkable beauty on Monday evening, October 28th, in Elmwood Music Hall.

This is the opening program in the orchestra series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation. The complete program is as follows:

Vivaldi.....Concerto in D minor
Debussy..Nocturne, Clouds and Festivals
Scriabin.....Poem of Ecstasy
Beethoven..... Fifth Symphony

On the printed program which the Boston Symphony always furnishes for its concerts on tour, the conductor's name is now given for the first time as Dr. Koussevitzky. He received an honorary degree last June from Harvard. He also holds an honorary degree from Brown.

Dr. Koussevitzky returns for his sixth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony, comes back to an orchestra he has molded to his will and made into a superb musical instrument. The Boston Symphony is an orchestra still unsurpassed in the world.

At the opening concert of the season in Boston on October 12th, a standing audience and orchestra greeted the famous conductor as he stepped upon the stage in Symphony Hall to begin the orchestra's 49th season. Not a single new face is to be seen in the orchestra this year. It is said by Boston critics to be a more nearly perfect ensemble now than it has ever been at this time in any other season.

Koussevitzky's interpretation of the music by Beethoven is justly famous. Triumphantly, according to recent Boston reviews, he leads his forces from mountain peak to mountain peak in the Fifth Symphony, disclosing new heights in its sublimity and grandeur.

The Boston Symphony opens the season of seven concerts under the auspices of the Boston Musical Foundation. On December 3d, Ossip Gabrilowitsch will be welcomed back, after a year's absence and the opening concert, for this season of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, which will be heard in Elmwood Music Hall this winter. The Chicago Symphony, Frederick Stock conductor, comes on January 21st, to give another brilliant high light in this musical season. The Cincinnati Symphony, with Fritz Reiner, returning after several years' absence, and the Cleveland Orchestra with Nikolai Sokoloff conducting, will conclude this most distinguished orchestra series ever given in Buffalo, under the auspices of the Buffalo Musical Foundation.

The public season sale opens tomorrow in the box office of Denton, Cottier & Daniels store.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra tickets go on sale Thursday, October 24th, in Denton Cottier & Daniels' box office. Mail orders may be sent meantime to the Buffalo Musical Foundation office, where they will be filled before the box office sale opens.

* * *

Koussevitzky

Distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will open the orchestral series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation in Elmwood Music Hall, Monday evening, October 28th.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO
TIMES
OCT 20 [illegible]

Boston Symphony Concert Set For Elmwood Hall, October 28

Beethoven Fifth Symphony on Program of Noted Musical Organization Directed by Koussevitzky

Playing the Beethoven Fifth Symphony with which he opened this season in Symphony Hall, Boston, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program of remarkable beauty on Monday evening, October 28, in Elmwood Music Hall.

This is the opening program in the Orchestra Series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation:

Vivaldi—Conerto in D Minor.
Debussy—Nocturnes, Clouds and Festivals.
Scriabin—Poem of Ecstasy.
Beethoven—Fifth Symphony.

On the printed program which the Boston Symphony always furnishes for its concerts on tour, the conductor's name is now given for the first time as Dr. Kroussevitzky. He received an honorary degree last June from Harvard. He also holds an honorary degree from Brown.

Dr. Kussevitzky returns for his sixth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony; comes back to an orchestra he has molded to his will and made into a superb musical instrument.

At the opening concert of the season in Boston on October 12, a standing audience and orchestra greeted the famous conductor as he stepped upon the stage in Symphony Hall to begin the orchestra's 49th season. Not a single new face is to be seen in the orchestra this year. It is said by Boston critics to be a more nearly perfect ensemble now than it has ever been at this time in any other season.

Koussevitzky's interpretation of the music by Beethoven is justly famous. Triumphantly, according to recent Boston reviews, he leads his forces from mountain peak to mountain peak in the Fifth Symphony, disclosing new heights in its sublimity and grandeur.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER
OCT 24 1929

CHANGE IN PROGRAM

Stravinsky suite to be played here by Boston Symphony

For the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra which takes place next Monday night at 3.15 o'clock in Elmwood Music Hall with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, the seats go on sale this morning at 9 o'clock in the box office, Denton Cottier & Daniels.

According to an announcement received yesterday at the office of the Buffalo Musical Foundation, a delightful change is announced in the Boston Symphony program. The third number will be Stravinsky's orchestral suite from the ballet, Petrouchka, instead of the Scriabine Poem of Ecstasy which was announced.

The Vivaldi Conerto in D Minor for a string orchestra has been edited for modern orchestral use by Alexander Siloti and will be the opening number next Monday night. The French and Russian schools of music will be eloquently represented by Debussy's Nocturnes and the Stravinsky ballet suite.

The Fifth Symphony of Beethoven, which Koussevitzky is said to give dramatic interpretation, will conclude the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM Buffalo Union & Times
OCT 24 1929

Boston Orchestra Here on Monday

On Monday evening, October 28th, in the Elmwood Music Hall, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program of remarkable beauty, playing the Beethoven Fifth Symphony, with which he opened this season in Symphony Hall, Boston.

This is the opening event in the orchestra series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation. The complete program is as follows: Vivadi, Concerto in D Minor; Debussy, Nocturnes, Clouds and Festivals; Scriabin, Poem of Ecstasy, and Beethoven, Fifth Symphony.

Dr. Koussevitzky returning for his sixth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony, comes back to an orchestra he has molded to his will and made into a superb musical instrument.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra tickets go on sale Thursday, October 24th, at Denton, Cottier and Daniels box office. Mail orders may be sent to the Buffalo Musical Foundation office where they will be opened before the box office sale.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE GAZETTE
NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.
OCT 25 1929

Musical Events

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conducting, will open the orchestra series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation, Monday evening, October 28, in Elmwood Music Hall.

The complete program is as follows: "Concerto in D Minor," a nacturne, "Clouds and Festival," Debussy; "Poem of Ecstasy," Scriabine, and the immortal "Fifth" Symphony of Beethoven, the key to which he himself furnished in the cryptic phrase "Fate Knocks at the Door."

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEI

Opens the Buffalo Musical Foundation Serge Koussevitsky to Cor

THE coming week holds an important musical event in the scheduled annual visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, Monday evening, in Elmwood Music hall. The Boston organization opens the Buffalo Musical foundation's orchestra series of the season.

The Chromatic club will open its season next Saturday afternoon, Nov. 2, in the Twentieth Century club, presenting a local program. The club plans an interesting season of afternoon and evening concerts.

An early November recital will be that of the Roth String quartet, the first attraction of the Buffalo Symphony society's Chamber Music series, in Hotel Statler ballroom. The same month gives promise of a week of Opera by the American Grand Opera company, beginning Nov. 18, and the opening concert of the Van De Mark series, Nov. 26.

* * *

"AN ENSEMBLE of masters," the Boston Symphony orchestra, will open the orchestra series of the Buffalo Musical foundation next Monday evening at 8:15 o'clock in Elmwood Music hall, under its illustrious leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

With one number changed from the program announced last week, the orchestra will be heard in the following:

Concerto in D Minor for Orchestra (Edited by A. Siloti) ..... Vivaldi
Two Nocturnes ..... Debussy
(a) Nuages
(b) Fetes
Orchestral Suite from the Ballet Petrouchka ..... Stravinsky
Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, Op. 6 ..... Beethoven

Opening with the Concerto for string orchestra by Antonio Vivaldi, the 18th century Italian composer, drawing from two eloquent exponents of the French and Russian schools in the music of Debussy and Stravinsky, and concluding with Beethoven, the great master, the program is one to delight and inspire. The Vivaldi work represents the great 18th century violinist in effective harmonic forms, expressive [illegible] a facility which is at all times remarkable.

In his Nocturnes, Debussy is revealed as the impressionist painter, the master of mood and subtle suggestion.

Many critics deny that Stravinsky ever surpassed "Petrouchka," which is said completely to unfold the composer's striking personality. According to Grove, "As regards brilliancy and originality of scoring, and aptness of characterization, this work still remains Stravinsky's undisputed masterpiece."

The Symphony in C minor, by Beethoven, with which a great many orchestral seasons have been opened this year throughout the country, is said by Hector Berlioz "to come directly and solely from the genius of Beethoven; he develops in it his own intimate thought; his secret sorrows, his concentrated rage, his reveries, his bursts of enthusiasms—these furnish him the subject; and the forms of melody, harmony, rhythm and orchestration are displayed as essentially individual and new as they are powerful and noble."

The next two concerts in the Orchestra series will be by the Detroit Symphony, with Ossip Gabrilowitsch conducting, Tuesday evening, Dec. 3, and the Chicago symphony, with Frederick Stock conducting, Tuesday evening, Jan. 21.

* * *

THE Roth quartet, which is to open the Buffalo Symphony Society Chamber Music series in the Statler ballroom, Tuesday evening, Nov. 12, returned recently to this country and played in Town hall, New York, last week.

The New York Herald reports: "The large audience, undaunted by the inclement weather, was rewarded by a performance that, for perfection of balance, exquisite nuance and genuine expressive power, one would have to seek far to find its peer. There were some dissenting voices among the numerous string players present last evening, some of them, needless to add, members of like organizations, but it seemed to us that a closer approach to an ideal achievement would be difficult of attainment from mere human players."

The New York American adds: "They possess an ensemble of delectable finish, a tone quality and adjustment of subtle appeal, they play flawlessly in tune and rhythm, with refined and authoritative musicianship and a high degree of warmth in feeling," while the New York Times observes "We have seldom heard anything more lovely than the adagio of the Beethoven Quartet in F nor the andantino of the Debussy C[illegible]

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra in its annual Buffalo concert in Elmwood Music hall, Monday night.

WESTERN TRIP - 1929 -

BUFFALO - CHICAGO - PITTSBURG - INDIANAPOLIS - ST. PAUL - MINNEAPOLIS

140

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

THE earliest of the October musical events will be the recital by Marcel Dupre, concert organist, in the Church of the Atonement, Oct. 7. Arthur Pye, violinist, plays here the same week, in the Twentieth Century club.

Serge Koussevitzky, who begins the Buffalo Musical foundation's orchestra series, Oct. 28, has just returned from Europe, bringing with him interesting music for the orchestral repertoire.

Local organizations will figure actively in the season"s musical affairs.

* * *

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which plays in Elmwood Music hall Monday evening, Oct. 28, arrived in New York this week on the Ile de France, from Europe, full of plans for the season, and especially for next year, when the Boston Symphony celebrates its semi-centennial.

According to the Boston Evening Transcript, Mr. Koussevitzky has commissioned Igor Stravinsky and Serge Prokofieff to write works for this celebration, and it is planned to invite the first conductor of the orchestra, Sir George Henschel, who was in charge from 1881 to 1885, to come from England to conduct at least part of a concert program.

The Boston Symphony comes first in the Orchestra series under the auspices of the Buffalo Musical foundation, at Elmwood Music hall this year.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO
TIMES
OCT 6 - 1929

Boston Orch- Seri.

glove—these are that dot the i's ihion!
it been so essen-
about these lit-

Opening its season Boston Symphony and the Detroit Symphony and the Chicago scheduled, the Buffalo Musical Foundation predicts one of the most brilliant orchestral seasons in its history for the coming season at Elmwood Music Hall.

This will be Serge Koussevitzky's sixth season with the Boston Symphony and the 9th season of its existence.

He is of a line of brilliant conductors who have presided over the artistic destiny of the famous organization.

The Boston orchestra which opens the series, October 28, was founded and for 37 years sustained by the late Henry Lee Higginson.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER
OCT 13

Orchestral Series

"The young American composers are more interesting than the young Europeans. I much prefer the young Americans." Thus spake Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, upon his arrival recently in this country after another summer on the continent, much of which time was spent delving among the works of the "young Europeans."

Whether Koussevitzky will include any works by the "young Americans" on his list when he comes to Buffalo with the Boston forces on Monday evening, October 28th, auspices of the Buffalo Musical Foundation remains to be seen. The program will be announced later for this city.

Meantime, by way of illustrating what American composers can do, Mr. Koussevitzky will proffer this season, in his symphony course in Boston, a symphony by Aaron Copeland and tone poems by Werner Josten and Roger Sessions, all in their initial performances, together with a piece that has particularly struck the composer's fancy, Samuel Gardner's Broadway. There will be European novelties, also, not only by "young Europeans," but also by the established composers. For the first time, Boston will hear Mahler's Ninth Symphony and his Kindertotenlieder, a cycle of five songs with orchestra, also a concerto for wind instruments by Spohr.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER
OCT 20 1929

MUSIC

Koussevitzky With Boston Symphony

Playing the Beethoven Fifth Symphony, with which he opened this season in Symphony Hall, Boston, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program of remarkable beauty on Monday evening, October 28th, in Elmwood Music Hall.

This is the opening program in the orchestra series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation. The complete program is as follows:

Vivaldi.....Concerto in D minor
Debussy..Nocturne, Clouds and Festivals
Scriabin.....Poem of Ecstasy
Beethoven..... Fifth Symphony

On the printed program which the Boston Symphony always furnishes for its concerts on tour, the conductor's name is now given for the first time as Dr. Koussevitzky. He received an honorary degree last June from Harvard. He also holds an honorary degree from Brown.

Dr. Koussevitzky returns for his sixth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony, comes back to an orchestra he has molded to his will and made into a superb musical instrument. The Boston Symphony is an orchestra still unsurpassed in the world.

At the opening concert of the season in Boston on October 12th, a standing audience and orchestra greeted the famous conductor as he stepped upon the stage in Symphony Hall to begin the orchestra's 49th season. Not a single new face is to be seen in the orchestra this year. It is said by Boston critics to be a more nearly perfect ensembele now than it has ever been at this time in any other season.

Kaussevitzky's interpretation of the music by Beethoven is justly famous. Triumphantly, according to recent Boston reviews, he leads his forces from mountain peak to mountain peak in the Fifth Symphony, disclosing new heights in its sublimity and grandeur.

The Boston Symphony opens the season of seven concerts under the auspices of the Boston Musical Foundation. On December 3d, Ossip Gabrilowitsch will be welcomed back, after a year's absence and the opening concert, for this season of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, which will be heard in Elmwood Music Hall this winter. The Chicago Symphony, Frederick Stock conductor, comes on January 21st, to give another brilliant high light in this musical season. The Cincinnati Symphony, with Fritz Reiner, returning after several years' absence, and the Cleveland Orchestra with Nikoloi Sokoloff conducting, will conclude this most distinguished orchestra series ever given in Buffalo, under the auspices of the Buffalo Musical Foundation.

The public season sale opens tomorrow in the box office of Denton, Cottier & Daniels store.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra tickets go on sale Thursday, October 24th, in Denton Cottier & Daniels' box office. Mail orders may be sent meantime to the Buffalo Musical Foundation office, where they will be filled before the box office sale opens.

* * *

Koussevitzky

Distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will open the orchestral series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation in Elmwood Music Hall, Monday evening, October 28th.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO
TIMES
OCT 20 [illegible]

$125.00

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
OCT 26 [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER
OCT 24 1929

CHANGE IN PROGRAM

Stravinsky suite to be played here by Boston Symphony

For the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra which takes place next Monday night at 3.15 o'clock in Elmwood Music Hall with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, the seats go on sale this morning at 9 o'clock in the box office, Denton Cottier & Daniels.

According to an announcement received yesterday at the office of the Buffalo Musical Foundation, a delightful change is announced in the Boston Symphony program. The third number will be Stravinsky's orchestral suite from the ballet, Petrouchka, instead of the Scriabine Poem of Ecstasy which was announced.

The Vivaldi Conerto in D Minor for a string orchestra has been edited for modern orchestral use by Alexander Siloti and will be the opening number next Monday night. The French and Russian schools of music will be eloquently represented by Debussy's Nocturnes and the Stravinsky ballet suite.

The Fifth Symphony of Beethoven, of which Koussevitzky is said to give a dramatic interpretation, will conclude the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM Catholic Union & Times
Buffalo, N.Y.
OCT 24 1929

Boston Orchestra Here on Monday

On Monday evening, October 28th, in the Elmwood Music Hall, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program of remarkable beauty, playing the Beethoven Fifth Symphony, with which he opened this season in Symphony Hall, Boston.

This is the opening event in the orchestra series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation. The complete program is as follows: Vivadi, Concerto in D Minor; Debussy, Nocturnes, Clouds and Festivals; Scriabin, Poem of Ecstasy, and Beethoven, Fifth Symphony.

Dr. Koussevitzky returning for his sixth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony, comes back to an orchestra he has molded to his will and made into a superb musical instrument.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra tickets go on sale Thursday, October 24th, at Denton, Cottier and Daniels box office. Mail orders may be sent to the Buffalo Musical Foundation office where they will be opened before the box office sale.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
GAZETTE
NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.
OCT 25 1929

Musical Events

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conducting, will open the orchestra series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation, Monday evening, October 28, in Elmwood Music Hall.

The complete program is as follows: "Concerto in D Minor," a nacturne, "Clouds and Festival," Debussy; "Poem of Ecstasy," Scriabine, and the immortal "Fifth" Symphony of Beethoven, the key to which he himself furnished in the cryptic phrase "Fate Knocks at the Door."

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEI

Opens the Buffalo Musical Foundation Serge Koussevitsky to Cor

THE coming week holds an important musical event in the scheduled annual visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, Monday evening in Elmwood Music hall. The Boston organization opens the Buffalo Musical foundation's orchestra series of the season.

The Chromatic club will open its season next Saturday afternoon, Nov. 2, in the Twentieth Century club, presenting a local program. The club plans an interesting season of afternoon and evening concerts.

An early November recital will be that of the Roth String quartet, the first attraction of the Buffalo Symphony society's Chamber Music series, in Hotel Statler ballroom. The same month gives promise of a week of Opera by the American Grand Opera company, beginning Nov. 18, and the opening concert of the Van De Mark series, Nov. 26.

* * *

"AN ENSEMBLE of masters," the Boston Symphony orchestra, will open the orchestra series of the Buffalo Musical foundation next Monday evening at 8:15 o'clock in Elmwood Music hall, under its illustrious leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

With one number changed from the program announced last week, the orchestra will be heard in the following:

Concerto in D Minor for Orchestra (Edited by A. Siloti) ..... Vivaldi
Two Nocturnes ..... Debussy
(a) Nuages
(b) Fetes
Orchestral Suite from the Ballet Petrouchka ..... Stravinsky
Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, Op. 6 ..... Beethoven

Opening with the Concerto for string orchestra by Antonio Vivaldi, the 18th century Italian composer, drawing from two eloquent exponents of the French and Russian schools in the music of Debussy and Stravinsky, and concluding with Beethoven, the great master, the program is one to delight and inspire. The Vivaldi work represents the great 18th century violinist in effective harmonic forms, expressing melody [illegible] a facility which is at all times remarkable.

In his Nocturnes, Debussy is revealed as the impressionist painter, the master of mood and subtle suggestion.

Many critics deny that Stravinsky ever surpassed "Petrouchka," which is said completely to unfold the composer's striking personality. According to Grove, "As regards brilliancy and originality of scoring, and aptness of characterization, this work still remains Stravinsky's undisputed masterpiece."

The Symphony in C minor, by Beethoven, with which a great many orchestral seasons have been opened this year throughout the country, is said by Hector Berlioz "to come directly and solely from the genius of Beethoven; he develops in it his own intimate thought; his secret sorrows, his concentrated rage, his reveries, his bursts of enthusiasms—these furnish him the subject; and the forms of melody, harmony, rhythm and orchestration are displayed as essentially individual and new as they are powerful and noble."

The next two concerts in the Orchestra series will be by the Detroit Symphony, with Ossip Gabrilowitsch conducting, Tuesday evening, Dec. 3, and the Chicago symphony, with Frederick Stock conducting, Tuesday evening, Jan. 21.

* * *

THE Roth quartet, which is to open the Buffalo Symphony Society Chamber Music series in the Statler ballroom, Tuesday evening, Nov. 12, returned recently to this country and played in Town hall, New York, last week.

The New York Herald reports: "The large audience, undaunted by the inclement weather, was rewarded by a performance that, for perfection of balance, exquisite nuance and genuine expressive power, one would have to seek far to find its peer. There were some dissenting voices among the numerous string players present last evening, some of them, needless to add, members of like organizations, but it seemed to us that a closer approach to an ideal achievement would be difficult of attainment from mere human players."

The New York American adds: "They possess an ensemble of delectable finish, a tone quality and adjustment of subtle appeal, they play flawlessly in tune and rhythm, with refined and authoritative musicianship and a high degree of warmth in feeling," while the New York Times observes "We have seldom heard anything more lovely than the adagio of the Beethoven Quartet in F nor the andantino of the Debussy C[illegible]

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra in its annual Buffalo concert in Elmwood Music hall, Monday night.

1241

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO
TIMES

Boston Musical Group Presents Concert Monday

Symphony Opens Buffalo Foundation Series; Opera Company Later

THE Boston Symphony orchestra, which has been fittingly named "an ensemble of masters," will open the orchestra series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation tomorrow evening at 8:15 o'clock at Elmwood Music Hall under its illustrious leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

With one number changed from the program announced last week, the orchestra will be heard in the following:

Vivaldi—Concerto in D Minor for orchestra (Edited by A. Siloti).
Debussy—Two Nocturnes
a) Nuages
b) Fetes
Stravinsky—Orchestral Suite from the Ballet Patrouchka
Beethoven—Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, Op. 6.

There will be an intermission of ten minutes before the symphony.

* * *

WITH this program, it is expected that a new and glorious chapter will be written in the musical annals of Buffalo. Opening with the concerto for string orchestra by Antonio Vivaldi, the 18th century Italian composer, drawing from two eloquent exponents from the French and Russian schools, in the music of Stravinky and Debussy, and concluding with Beethoven, the great master, this is a program to delight and inspire. The Vivaldi work, calling for an orchestra of the marvelous technical fitness of the Boston Symphony, represents the great 18th century violinist in effective harmonic forms, expressive melody and the facility which is at times remarkable.

In his Nocturnes, Debussy is revealed as the impressionist painter, the master of mood and subtle suggestion.

* * *

WITH a slight change in schedule, which is merely a re-arrangement of the latter part of the week's program, the American Opera Company comes to the Shubert-Teck the week of November 18th, auspices of the Buffalo Musical Foundation.

The performances now come on the following dates:
Monday, Faust.
Tuesday, Carmen.
Wednesday, Yolanda of Cyprus.
Thursday, Butterfly.
Friday, Figaro.
Saturday afternoon, Faust.
Saturday evening, Martha.

Music-drama in the language of the audience is constantly winning new supporters for the national opera into which the America Opera Company's supporters hope it may develop.

* * *

Seats for the Boston Symphony concert and also for the entire orchestra series of seven concerts are on sale at the box-office, Denton Cottier & Daniels.

* * *

Among those who have reserved seats are: Mrs. Lewis J. Surdam, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest M. Hill, Mr. and Mrs. George F. Plimpton, Mrs. John W. Danforth, Mrs. Parton Swift, Mrs. James Cary Evans, Mrs. Reginald B. Taylor, Mrs. Theodore M. Pomeroy, Mrs. Charles W. Banta, Miss Jeanette Urban, Mrs. C. R. Wyckoff, Mrs. Andrew Thompson, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Gratwick, Mr. and Mrs. Mitchell Gratwick, Mrs. George Dudley Enos.

Mrs. E. W. Westcott, of Niagara Falls, Mrs. William C. Warren, Mr. and Mrs. Roland Lord O'Brian, Mrs. George Howard Lewis, Mrs. Langdon, Albright, Mrs. John O. Adsit, Mrs. George D. Barrell, Mr. and Mrs. Farny R. Wurlitzer, Tonawanda, N. Y., Judge and Mrs. Louis B. Hart, Mr. and Mrs. F. G. Raichle, jr., Mr. and Mrs. John Ganson Evans.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles A. Criqui, Dr. and Mrs. Julian Park, Mrs. Dexter P. Rumsey, Miss Evelyn Fiske, Mr. and Mrs. H. M. Gerrans, Mr. and Mrs. Phillip Becker Goetz, Justice and Mrs. Samuel J. Harris, Mr. and Mrs. Fred D. Corey, Mrs. O. P. Letchworth, Mrs. Charles L. Gurney, Mrs. Frank F. Henry, Mrs. J. P. Dodman, Mrs. Harry T. Ramsdell, Mr. and Mrs. Bradley Gaylord, Mr. and Mrs. E. E. Franchot of Niagara Falls.

Mr. and Mrs. John L. Kimberly, Mrs. S. M. Clement and Mrs. Charles H. Frost, Mr. and Mrs. Frank H. Goodyear, Mr. and Mrs. Frank B. Baird, Mrs. J. F. Schoellkopf, Mrs. Charles W. Goodyear, Mr. and Mrs. Bradley Goodyear, Mrs. John Olmstead, Mrs. Robert L. Fryer, Mr. and Mrs. Chauncy J. Hamlin.

Mrs. Carlton M. Smith, Mrs. L. D. Rumsey, Mrs. F. B. Cooley, Mr. and Mrs. A. H. Schoellkopf, Mr. and Mrs. Carl E. Bowen, Mrs. Eva S. Potter, Lars S. Potter, Dr. and Mrs. James Wright Putnam, Mr. and Mrs. Charles M. Kennedy, Mrs. Charles M. Kennedy, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic Ullman, jr., Mr. and Mrs. Richard Ullman, Mr. and Mrs. E. A. Stevens, Mrs. Harry Yates, Mrs. R. W. Wattles, Mrs. Edgar Wendt, Mr. and Mrs. Whitney G. Case, Mr. and Mrs. A. B. Watson, Mr. and Mrs. Nelson S. Taylor, Mrs. Humphrey Birge, Mrs. E. B. McKenna,

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO
TIMES
OCT 27

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will play Monday evening at 8:15 o'clock in Elmwood Music hall. The program is the first of the series to be given by the Buffalo Musical Foundation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
OCT 28

Select Audience to Greet Boston Orchestra Here

Society Makes Reservations For Symphony Premier Monday Evening.

A brilliant and fashionable audience will be present when the Boston Symphony orchestra plays its opening program Monday evening in Elmwood Music hall under auspices of the Buffalo Musical foundation.

Among those who have reserved seats are: Mrs. Lewis J. Surdam, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest M. Hill, Mr. and Mrs. George F. Plimpton, Mrs. Parton Swift, Mrs. James Carey Evans, Mrs. Reginald B. Taylor, Mrs. Theodore M. Pomeroy, Mrs. Charles W. Banta, Miss Jeanette Urban, Mrs. Clinton R. Wyckoff, Mrs. Andrew Thompson, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick C. Gratwick, Mr. and Mrs. Mitchell Gratwick, Mrs. George Dudley Enos, Mrs. William C. Warren, Mr. and Mrs. Roland Lord O'Brian, Mrs. George Howard Lewis, Mrs. Langdon Albright, Mrs. John O. Adsit, Mrs. George B. Barrell, Judge and Mrs. Louis B. Hart, Mr. and Mrs. Frank G. Raichle Jr., Mr. and Mrs. John G. Evans, Mr. and Mrs. Charles A. Criqui, Dr. and Mrs. Julian Park, Mrs. Dexter P. Rumsey.

Miss Evelyn Fiske, Mr. and Mrs. Philip Becker Goetz, Mr. and Mrs. Fred D. Corey, Mrs. Ogden P. Letchworth, Mrs. Charles L. Gurney, Mrs. Frank F. Henry, Mrs. Josephine P. Dodman, Mrs. Louis R. Davidson, Mrs. Harry T. Ramsdell, Mr. and Mrs. Bradley J. Gaylord, Mr. and Mrs. John L. Kimberly, Mrs. Stephen M. Clement, Mrs. Charles H. Frost, Mr. and Mrs. Frank H. Goodyear, Mr. and Mrs. Frank B. Baird, Mrs. Charles W. Goodyear, Mr. and Mrs. Bradley Goodyear, Mrs. John Olmsted, Mrs. Robert L. Fryer, Mr. and Mrs. Chauncey J. Hamlin, Dr. and Mrs. Henry Ten Eyck Perry.

Mrs. Carlton M. Smith, Mrs. Laurence D. Rumsey, Mrs. Frederick B. Cooley, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred H. Schoellkopf, Mr. and Mrs. Carl H. Bowen, Mrs. Eva S. Potter, Dr. Lars S. Potter, Dr. and Mrs. James W. Putnam, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic Ullman Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Richard Ullman, Mrs. Harry E. Yates, Mr. and Mrs. Whitney G. Case, Mr. and Mrs. Arnold B. Watson, Mr. and Mrs. Nelson S. Taylor, Mrs. Humphrey Birge, Mrs. Edmund B. McKenna, Mrs. Frederick L. Pratt, Mrs. Joseph T. Jones and Miss Clara Michael.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO
TIMES
OCT 28

MUSICAL SERIES OPENS TONIGHT

Boston Symphony, Under Koussevitzky, Will Inaugurate Local Season

Inaugurating of the 1929-30 orchestra series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation, the Boston Symphony orchestra under the masterly direction of Serge Koussevitzky will present a varied program at 8:15 p. m. today at the Elmwood Music hall.

The program will contain four separate selections, each calling for different technique on the part of the 108 musicians which make up the famous Boston organization.

Climaxed by Beethoven's great Fifth Symphony, Koussevitzky's choices will include Stravinsky's orchestral suite from the ballet Petrouchka, two nocturnes by Debussy and a concerto in D minor by Antonio Vivaldi.

Seats for the concert and for the entire series are on sale at Denton, Cottier & Daniels.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER
OCT 28

BOSTON SYMPHONY ARRIVES FOR CONCERT THIS EVENING

This morning at 11.45 the Boston Symphony Orchestra arrives in Buffalo to play tonight in Elmwood Music Hall, with Dr. Serge Kousseoitzky conducting, the opening concert in the orchestra series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation.

The concert will begin promptly at 8.15. The Foundation announces for this season a resolution, in which it is hoped concertgoers will concur, to begin programs promptly. Therefore, it is requested that tonight the audience be in the hall before 8.15 o'clock.

The opening number, the Vivaldi Concerto in D minor, has not been played in Buffalo before, it is believed, and is expected to act as an incentive to be on time.

The rest of the program will include Debussy's Clouds and Festivals and Strasinskys' Petrouchka, followed by a Beethoven Fifth Smyphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO
TIMES
OCT 29

Boston Symphony First Concert

Brilliant and Fashionable Audience Trongs Elmwood Music Hall

The neutrality of atmosphere the Elmwood Music hall provides last night proved an effective setting for one of the most colorful events of the musical and social year, the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opening the symphonic series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation. Led by Serge Koussevitzky, whose personal drawing power is tremendous, the orchestra played before a capacity audience.

It took a supreme effort to detach oneself from the continuity of high satisfaction that pervaded the audience sufficiently to observe the following:

Mrs. Frederick Ullman, Jr. in black and capucine chiffon and mink wrap; Miss Kate Lyon in a green velvet furlined wrap; Miss Bessie Bellanca in capucine crepe with wrap to match, mink trimmed; Miss Jean Douglass in carnation green chiffon; Mrs. Henry Ten Eyck Perry in black and green chiffon; Miss Mabel Elias in brown velvet; Mrs. Maurice Goddard Field in pink velvet with sable collar.

Others noticed in the audience were: Mrs. Risley Tucker with her son, Robert J. Jewett; Mrs. Joseph Morey with Miss Katrina Morey, Philip Boocock and William I. Morey, Mrs. Albert Hatch with Mrs. Ulysses Caudell, Mr. and Mrs. Francesus Visser 'tHooft, Mrs. George A. Himmelsbach, Dr. Samuel P. Capen and Miss Mary Capen, Miss Rosalind Marcus and Mrs. Henry Marcus, Mr. and Mrs. Noel Speer Symons, Mr. and Mrs. Otto Grauer, Mr. and Mrs. Richard Ullman, Mrs. Elwood C. Grissinger, Francis H. Bangs, Mrs. Eva Potter with Lars Potter and Mr. and Mrs. Frank Potter, jr., Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kennedy, Mr. and Mrs. Whitney Case, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Jones, Mrs. Evelyn Choate, Mr. and Mrs. R. W. Wattles, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Ten Eyck Perry, Mrs. Robert Livongston Fryer.

Mr. and Mrs. Lewis J. Surdam, Mrs. Parton Swift, Mrs. James Carey Evans, Mrs. William C. Warren, Mrs. Roland Lord O'Brian, Mrs. Frank F. Henry with Mrs. Robert Pomeroy, Dr. and Mrs. Julian Park, Mrs. John O. Adsit with her daughter, Mrs. George D. Barrell; Mr. and Mrs. Ernest M. Hill, Mr. and Mrs. Philip Metz, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Gratwick, Miss Jeanette Urban, Mr. and Mrs. F. G. Raichle and Eugene Gay Tifft.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
OCT 29 1929

Boston Symphony Scores

Rendition of Beethoven's Famous "Fifth" at Opening of Foundation Series Leaves Audience Entranced.

By EDWARD DURNEY

The return of the Boston Symphony orchestra and its magnetic conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, for a concert Monday evening, in Elmwood Music hall, provided the significant opening event of the Buffalo Musical foundation's orchestra series of the present season. Koussevitzky's memorable program of last season brilliantly opened the same management's course, then, as now, setting a lofty standard for those following. And harking back a few years to the night of this distinguished conductor's local debut as leader of the Boston forces one recalls with interest that his first symphonic reading before a Buffalo audience was that of the Beethoven Fifth, which he presented again Monday evening.

Koussevitzky's individualism invariably impresses the listener, and to the credit of this logical musician and artist. He reads the Beethoven work profoundly, deliberately, calling attention to its broader lines and revealing his perception of its comprehensive, emotional spirit. At the same time he is sensitive to its poetry, its moments of delicacy; and his interpretation presents vivid contrast.

The Fifth symphony, while wholly virtuous as a formal composition, exerts great popular appeal and is hailed with joy by audiences generally. The Boston orchestra, Koussevitzky's superfine instrument, gives it a performance notable for its finish and clarity of utterance. The responsive audience of Monday evening gave breathless attention from beginning to end of the work, thrilling especially to the electrifying manner of the finale, in which Koussevitzky inspired his men to scale the heights.

The first part of the program made the chronological leap from the prolific Italian, Vivaldi, to Debussy and Stravinsky. Vivaldi was represented by a Concerto, in D Minor, according to the edition of Alexander Siloti, noted Russian pianist. The composition was the evening's first offering and its three movements proved delightfully refreshing. The string choirs have prominent voice in publishing these stately, contrapuntal measures of Vivaldi, and in the flawless performance of the orchestra the listening ear was able easily to follow the several mingled instrumental voices contributing to the cheery musical conversation.

From the works of Debussy, unsurpassed painter of moods, were chosen "Nuages" and Fetes," two of the Nocturnes. "Nuages" is an exquisite tonal picture and "Fetes" is delightful in its realism. The performance of these numbers left nothing to be desired.

Like skill made for the advantageous hearing of the Stravinsky suite from the ballet "Petrouchka," a notable work of the much discussed Russian. This score, not entirely unfamiliar here, is riotous, bizarre and, needless to say, essentially descriptive. Its fitness as a ballet score is obvious.

The evening witnessed a great audience assembled to hear a great orchestra. Conductor Koussevitzky and his men received the tribute of round after round of enthusiastic applause.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
OCT 29

Boston Symphony Musicians Greeted by Large Audience

Society Turns Out in Bright Array for Elmwood Music Hall Concert.

A large audience greeted the Boston Symphony orchestra Monday evening in Elmwood Music hall at its opening program under auspices of the Buffalo Musical foundation.

Some of the guests noticed were Dr. and Mrs. Irving M. Snow, Mrs. Snow wearing a mulberry velvet evening coat; Mr. and Mrs. Harry Page Pierce, the latter in a black velvet wrap with ermine collar; Mrs Ogden P. Letchworth and her daughter, Mrs. George P. Warner, Mrs. Warner in a gold and black brocade drap; Miss Marie M. Love, Mrs. George Meadway in a black velvet wrap; Mrs. George E. Davidson Jr., black velvet coat with ermine collar; Mrs. Dexter P. Rumsey and Miss Evelyn Fiske, together; Mrs. Robert L. Fryer wearing a handsome wrap of brocaded gold and black.

Mrs. Samuel B. Lindsay wore a blue and gold evening coat over a gown of turquoise blue. With her were Mr. and Mrs. Nathaniel S. Norton, the latter in an American beauty wrap over black velvet gown, Miss Isabelle Lindsay in a pastel lace gown with peach velvet wrap.

Mrs. George Bleistein was noticed, also Miss Jane Mead Welch, Mrs. Cyrus S. Siegfried, Dr. and Mrs. Howard Osgood, Dr. and Mrs. A. L. Benedict, Miss Belle Laverack, Mrs. Ernest C. Hartwell, Miss Frances Riches, Miss Ada M. Fitts and Miss Maconda Fillmore.

Miss Anna Bimball wore a turquoise blue velvet wrap with gray fox collar and Miss Charlotte Becker a silver and blue velvet wrap.

Other guests were Mr. and Mrs. George B. Barrell, Miss Fanny Lou Barrell, Mrs. Buell G. Tallman, Mrs. H. Cowles Wadsworth, Mrs. Frank H. Potter, Miss Alice Potter, Miss Florence Thyng, Mrs. Edna Luse, Mrs. Richard K. Noye, Miss Patricia Boyle, Miss Mary A. Lewis, Miss Mary Kelsey, Miss Maud I. Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Adsit Bull, Miss Ella G. Christie and Mrs. Edwin Lang Miller.

141

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO
TIMES

Boston Musical Group Presents Concert Monday

Symphony Opens Buffalo Foundation Series; Opera Company Later

THE Boston Symphony orchestra, which has been fittingly named "an ensemble of masters," will open the orchestra series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation tomorrow evening at 8:15 o'clock at Elmwood Music Hall under its illustrious leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

With one number changed from the program announced last week, the orchestra will be heard in the following:

Vivaldi—Concerto in D Minor for orchestra (Edited by A. Siloti).
Debussy—Two Nocturnes
a) Nuages
b) Fetes
Stravinsky—Orchestral Suite from the Ballet Patrouchka
Beethoven—Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, Op. 6.

There will be an intermission of ten minutes before the symphony.

* * *

WITH this program, it is expected that a new and glorious chapter will be written in the musical annals of Buffalo. Opening with the concerto for string orchestra by Antonio Vivaldi, the 18th century Italian composer, drawing from two eloquent exponents from the French and Russian schools, in the music of Stravinky and Debussy, and concluding with Beethoven, the great master, this is a program to delight and inspire. The Vivaldi work, calling for an orchestra of the marvelous technical fitness of the Boston Symphony, represents the great 18th century violinist in effective harmonic forms, expressive melody and the facility which is at times remarkable.

In his Nocturnes, Debussy is revealed as the impressionist painter, the master of mood and subtle suggestion.

* * *

WITH a slight change in schedule, which is merely a re-arrangement of the latter part of the week's program, the American Opera Company comes to the Shubert-Teck the week of November 18th, auspices of the Buffalo Musical Foundation.

The performances now come on the following dates:

Monday, Faust.
Tuesday, Carmen.
Wednesday, Yolanda of Cyprus.
Thursday, Butterfly.
Friday, Figaro.
Saturday afternoon, Faust.
Saturday evening, Martha.

Music-drama in the language of the audience is constantly winning new supporters for the national opera into which the America Opera Company's supporters hope it may develop.

* * *

Seats for the Boston Symphony concert and also for the entire orchestra series of seven concerts are on sale at the box-office, Denton Cottier & Daniels.

* * *

Among those who have reserved seats are: Mrs. Lewis J. Surdam, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest M. Hill, Mr. and Mrs. George F. Plimpton, Mrs. John W. Danforth, Mrs. Parton Swift, Mrs. James Cary Evans, Mrs. Reginald B. Taylor, Mrs. Theodore M. Pomeroy, Mrs. Charles W. Banta, Miss Jeanette Urban, Mrs. C. R. Wyckoff, Mrs. Andrew Thompson, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Gratwick, Mr. and Mrs. Mitchell Gratwick, Mrs. George Dudley Enos.

Mrs. E. W. Westcott, of Niagara Falls, Mrs. William C. Warren, Mr. and Mrs. Roland Lord O'Brian, Mrs. George Howard Lewis, Mrs. Langdon, Albright, Mrs. John O. Adsit, Mrs. George D. Barrell, Mr. and Mrs. Farny R. Wurlitzer, Tonawanda, N. Y., Judge and Mrs. Louis B. Hart, Mr. and Mrs. F. G. Raichle, jr., Mr. and Mrs. John Ganson Evans.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles A. Criqui, Dr. and Mrs. Julian Park, Mrs. Dexter P. Rumsey, Miss Evelyn Fiske, Mr. and Mrs. H. M. Gerrans, Mr. and Mrs. Phillip Becker Goetz, Justice and Mrs. Samuel J. Harris, Mr. and Mrs. Fred D. Corey, Mrs. O. P. Letchworth, Mrs. Charles L. Gurney, Mrs. Frank F. Henry, Mrs. J. P. Dodman, Mrs. Harry T. Ramsdell, Mr. and Mrs. Bradley Gaylord, Mr. and Mrs. E. E. Franchot of Niagara Falls.

Mr. and Mrs. John L. Kimberly, Mrs. S. M. Clement and Mrs. Charles H. Frost, Mr. and Mrs. Frank H. Goodyear, Mr. and Mrs. Frank B. Baird, Mrs. J. F. Schoellkopf, Mrs. Charles W. Goodyear, Mr. and Mrs. Bradley Goodyear, Mrs. John Olmstead, Mrs. Robert L. Fryer, Mr. and Mrs. Chauncy J. Hamlin.

Mrs. Carlton M. Smith, Mrs. L. D. Rumsey, Mrs. F. B. Cooley, Mr. and Mrs. A. H. Schoellkopf, Mr. and Mrs. Carl E. Bowen, Mrs. Eva S. Potter, Lars S. Potter, Dr. and Mrs. James Wright Putnam, Mr. and Mrs. Charles M. Kennedy, Mrs. Charles M. Kennedy, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic Ullman, jr., Mr. and Mrs. Richard Ullman, Mr. and Mrs. E. A. Stevens, Mrs. Harry Yates, Mrs. R. W. Wattles, Mrs. Edgar Wendt, Mr. and Mrs. Whitney G. Case, Mr. and Mrs. A. B. Watson, Mr. and Mrs. Nelson S. Taylor, Mrs. Humphrey Birge, Mrs. E. B. McKenna,

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO
TIMES

OCT 27

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will play Monday evening at 8:15 o'clock in Elmwood Music hall. The program is the first of the series to be given by the Buffalo Musical Foundation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
OCT 28

Select Audience to Greet Boston Orchestra Here

Society Makes Reservations For Symphony Premier Monday Evening.

A brilliant and fashionable audience will be present when the Boston Symphony orchestra plays its opening program Monday evening in Elmwood Music hall under auspices of the Buffalo Musical foundation.

Among those who have reserved seats are: Mrs. Lewis J. Surdam, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest M. Hill, Mr. and Mrs. George F. Plimpton, Mrs. Parton Swift, Mrs. James Carey Evans, Mrs. Reginald B. Taylor, Mrs. Theodore M. Pomeroy, Mrs. Charles W. Banta, Miss Jeanette Urban, Mrs. Clinton R. Wyckoff, Mrs. Andrew Thompson, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick C. Gratwick, Mr. and Mrs. Mitchell Gratwick, Mrs. George Dudley Enos, Mrs. William C. Warren, Mr. and Mrs. Roland Lord O'Brian, Mrs. George Howard Lewis, Mrs. Langdon Albright, Mrs. John O. Adsit, Mrs. George B. Barrell, Judge and Mrs. Louis B. Hart, Mr. and Mrs. Frank G. Raichle Jr., Mr. and Mrs. John G. Evans, Mr. and Mrs. Charles A. Criqui, Dr. and Mrs. Julian Park, Mrs. Dexter P. Rumsey.

Miss Evelyn Fiske, Mr. and Mrs. Philip Becker Goetz, Mr. and Mrs. Fred D. Corey, Mrs. Ogden P. Letchworth, Mrs. Charles L. Gurney, Mrs. Frank F. Henry, Mrs. Josephine P. Dodman, Mrs. Louis R. Davidson, Mrs. Harry T. Ramsdell, Mr. and Mrs. Bradley J. Gaylord, Mr. and Mrs. John L. Kimberly, Mrs. Stephen M. Clement, Mrs. Charles H. Frost, Mr. and Mrs. Frank H. Goodyear, Mr. and Mrs. Frank B. Baird, Mrs. Charles W. Goodyear, Mr. and Mrs. Bradley Goodyear, Mrs. John Olmsted. Mrs. Robert L. Fryer, Mr. and Mrs. Chauncey J. Hamlin, Dr. and Mrs. Henry Ten Eyck Perry.

Mrs. Carlton M. Smith, Mrs. Laurence D. Rumsey, Mrs. Frederick B. Cooley, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred H. Schoellkopf, Mr. and Mrs. Carl H. Bowen, Mrs. Eva S. Potter, Dr. Lars S. Potter, Dr. and Mrs. James W. Putnam, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic Ullman Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Richard Ullman, Mrs. Harry E. Yates, Mr. and Mrs. Whitney G. Case, Mr. and Mrs. Arnold B. Watson, Mr. and Mrs. Nelson S. Taylor, Mrs. Humphrey Birge, Mrs. Edmund B. McKenna, Mrs. Frederick L. Pratt, Mrs. Joseph T. Jones and Miss Clara Michael.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO
TIMES

MUSICAL SERIES OPENS TONIGHT

Boston Symphony, Under Koussevitzky, Will Inaugurate Local Season

Inaugurating of the 1929-30 orchestra series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation, the Boston Symphony orchestra under the masterly direction of Serge Koussevitzky will present a varied program at 8:15 p. m. today at the Elmwood Music hall.

The program will contain four separate selections, each calling for different technique on the part of the 108 musicians which make up the famous Boston organization.

Climaxed by Beethoven's great Fifth Symphony, Koussevitzky's choices will include Stravinsky's orchestral suite from the ballet Petrouchka, two nocturnes by Debussy and a concerto in D minor by Antonio Vivaldi.

Seats for the concert and for the entire series are on sale at Denton, Cottier & Daniels.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER
OCT 29

BOSTON SYMPHONY ARRIVES FOR CONCERT THIS EVENING

This morning at 11.45 the Boston Symphony Orchestra arrives in Buffalo to play tonight in Elmwood Music Hall, with Dr. Serge Kousseoitzky conducting, the opening concert in the orchestra series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation.

The concert will begin promptly at 8.15. The Foundation announces for this season a resolution, in which it is hoped concertgoers will concur, to begin programs promptly. Therefore, it is requested that tonight the audience be in the hall before 8.15 o'clock.

The opening number, the Vivaldi Concerto in D minor, has not been played in Buffalo before, it is believed, and is expected to act as an incentive to be on time.

The rest of the program will include Debussy's Clouds and Festivals and Strasinskys' Petrouchka, followed by a Beethoven Fifth Smyphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO
TIMES

OCT 29

Boston Symphony First Concert

Brilliant and Fashionable Audience Trongs Elmwood Music Hall

The neutrality of atmosphere the Elmwood Music hall provides last night proved an effective setting for one of the most colorful events of the musical and social year, the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opening the symphonic series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation. Led by Serge Koussevitzky, whose personal drawing power is tremendous, the orchestra played before a capacity audience.

It took a supreme effort to detach oneself from the continuity of high satisfaction that pervaded the audience sufficiently to observe the following:

Mrs. Frederick Ullman, Jr. in black and capucine chiffon and mink wrap; Miss Kate Lyon in a green velvet furlined wrap; Miss Bessie Bellanca in capucine crepe with wrap to match, mink trimmed; Miss Jean Douglass in carnation green chiffon; Mrs. Henry Ten Eyck Perry in black and green chiffon; Miss Mabel Elias in brown velvet; Mrs. Maurice Goddard Field in pink velvet with sable collar.

Others noticed in the audience were: Mrs. Risley Tucker with her son, Robert J. Jewett; Mrs. Joseph Morey with Miss Katrina Morey, Philip Boocock and William I. Morey, Mrs. Albert Hatch with Mrs. Ulysses Caudell, Mr. and Mrs. Francesus Visser 'tHooft, Mrs. George A. Himmelsbach, Dr. Samuel P. Capen and Miss Mary Capen, Miss Rosalind Marcus and Mrs. Henry Marcus, Mr. and Mrs. Noel Speer Symons, Mr. and Mrs. Otto Grauer, Mr. and Mrs. Richard Ullman, Mrs. Elwood C. Grissinger, Francis H. Bangs, Mrs. Eva Potter with Lars Potter and Mr. and Mrs. Frank Potter, jr., Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kennedy, Mr. and Mrs. Whitney Case, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Jones, Mrs. Evelyn Choate, Mr. and Mrs. R. W. Wattles, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Ten Eyck Perry, Mrs. Robert Livongston Fryer.

Mr. and Mrs. Lewis J. Surdam, Mrs. Parton Swift, Mrs. James Carey Evans, Mrs. William C. Warren, Mrs. Roland Lord O'Brian, Mrs. Frank F. Henry with Mrs. Robert Pomeroy, Dr. and Mrs. Julian Park, Mrs. John O. Adsit with her daughter, Mrs. George D. Barrell; Mr. and Mrs. Ernest M. Hill, Mr. and Mrs. Philip Metz, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Gratwick, Miss Jeanette Urban, Mr. and Mrs. F. G. Raichle and Eugene Gay Tifft.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
OCT 29

Boston Symphony Scores

Rendition of Beethoven's Famous "Fifth" at Opening of Foundation Series Leaves Audience Entranced.

By EDWARD DURNEY

The return of the Boston Symphony orchestra and its magnetic conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, for a concert Monday evening, in Elmwood Music hall, provided the significant opening event of the Buffalo Musical foundation's orchestra series of the present season. Koussevitzky's memorable program of last season brilliantly opened the same management's course, then, as now, setting a lofty standard for those following. And harking back a few years to the night of this distinguished conductor's local debut as leader of the Boston forces one recalls with interest that his first symphonic reading before a Buffalo audience was that of the Beethoven Fifth, which he presented again Monday evening.

Koussevitzky's individualism invariably impresses the listener, and to the credit of this logical musician and artist. He reads the Beethoven work profoundly, deliberately, calling attention to its broader lines and revealing his perception of its comprehensive, emotional spirit. At the same time he is sensitive to its poetry, its moments of delicacy; and his interpretation presents vivid contrast.

The Fifth symphony, while wholly virtuous as a formal composition, exerts great popular appeal and is hailed with joy by audiences generally. The Boston orchestra, Koussevitzky's superfine instrument, gives it a performance notable for its finish and clarity of utterance. The responsive audience of Monday evening gave breathless attention from beginning to end of the work, thrilling especially to the electrifying manner of the finale, in which Koussevitzky inspired his men to scale the heights.

The first part of the program made the chronological leap from the prolific Italian, Vivaldi, to Debussy and Stravinsky. Vivaldi was represented by a Concerto, in D Minor, according to the edition of Alexander Siloti, noted Russian pianist. The composition was the evening's first offering and its three movements proved delightfully refreshing. The string choirs have prominent voice in publishing these stately, contrapuntal measures of Vivaldi, and in the flawless performance of the orchestra the listening ear was able easily to follow the several mingled instrumental voices contributing to the cheery musical conversation.

From the works of Debussy, unsurpassed painter of moods, were chosen "Nuages" and Fetes," two of the Nocturnes. "Nuages" is an exquisite tonal picture and "Fetes" is delightful in its realism. The performance of these numbers left nothing to be desired.

Like skill made for the advantageous hearing of the Stravinsky suite from the ballet "Petrouchka," a notable work of the much discussed Russian. This score, not entirely unfamiliar here, is riotous, bizarre and, needless to say, essentially descriptive. Its fitness as a ballet score is obvious.

The evening witnessed a great audience assembled to hear a great orchestra. Conductor Koussevitzky and his men received the tribute of round after round of enthusiastic applause.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

Boston Symphony Musicians Greeted by Large Audience

Society Turns Out in Bright Array for Elmwood Music Hall Concert.

A large audience greeted the Boston Symphony orchestra Monday evening in Elmwood Music hall at its opening program under auspices of the Buffalo Musical foundation.

Some of the guests noticed were Dr. and Mrs. Irving M Snow, Mrs. Snow wearing a mulberry velvet evening coat; Mr. and Mrs. Harry Page Pierce, the latter in a black velvet wrap with ermine collar; Mrs Ogden P. Letchworth and her daughter, Mrs. George P. Warner, Mrs. Warner in a gold and black brocade drap; Miss Marie M Love, Mrs. George Meadway in a black velvet wrap; Mrs. George E. Davidson Jr., black velvet coat with ermine collar; Mrs. Dexter P. Rumsey and Miss Evelyn Fiske, together; Mrs. Robert L. Fryer wearing a handsome wrap of brocaded gold and black

Mrs. Samuel B. Lindsay wore a blue and gold evening coat over a gown of turquoise blue. With her were Mr. and Mrs. Nathaniel S. Norton, the latter in an American beauty wrap over black velvet gown. Miss Isabelle Lindsay in a pastel lace gown with peach velvet wrap.

Mrs. George Bleistein was noticed, also Miss Jane Mead Welch, Mrs. Cyrus S. Siegfried, Dr. and Mrs. Howard Osgood, Dr. and Mrs. A. L. Benedict, Miss Belle Laverack, Mrs. Ernest C. Hartwell, Miss Frances Riches, Miss Ada M. Fitts and Miss Maconda Fillmore.

Miss Anna Bimball wore a turquoise blue velvet wrap with gray fox collar and Miss Charlotte Becker a silver and blue velvet wrap.

Other guests were Mr. and Mrs. George B. Barrell, Miss Fanny Lou Barrell, Mrs. Buell G. Tallman, Mrs. H. Cowles Wadsworth, Mrs. Frank H. Potter, Miss Alice Potter, Miss Florence Thyng, Mrs. Edna Luse, Mrs. Richard K. Noye, Miss Patricia Boyle, Miss Mary A. Lewis, Miss Mary Kelsey, Miss Maud I. Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Adsit Bull, Miss Ella G. Christie and Mrs. Edwin Lang Miller.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD EXAMINER
OCT 13 1929

THAT the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be brought to Chicago is theannouncement from H. E. Voegeli, manager of Orchestra Hall. The orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will give a concert Tuesday evening, October 29 at Orchestra Hall.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD EXAMINER
OCT 22 1929

Dr. Serge Koussevitzy and the eminent Boston Symphony Orchestra, when they visit us a week hence, will play the neurotic sixth symphony, prefacing it with Vivaldi, Debussy and Scriabine.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS
OCT 26

MUSICAL NEWS AND COMMENT ON HAPPENINGS

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Be Heard Here Tuesday Evening.

BY MAURICE ROSENFELD.

THE most important item of the immediate musical season is the concert scheduled for Tuesday evening at Orchestra hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conductor.

First known as a virtuoso on the double bass, the musician soon left the solo field for the more active work of the conductor, and after some experiences with symphony orchestras abroad came to Boston as the conductor of this, the oldest symphony orchestra in America, and here in five years he has established himself as one of the great conductors and musicians of the country.

The program for this event will be found in another column.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO
TRIBUNE
OCT 27

* *

Chance to Compare Orchestras.

There will be a chance to compare the symphony orchestras of Chicago and Boston this week. The first will appear according to its usual schedule, a "pop" on Thursday and its regular pair on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at Orchestra hall, plus a trip to Mandel hall for good measure early in the week. The second will appear also at Orchestra hall Tuesday evening.

Dr. Koussevitsky—he is a doctor of music, in case you have not heard—will direct Vivaldi's Concerto Grosso for organ and orchestra, Debussy's Two Nocturnes, the suite from Stravinky's "Petrouchka," and Tschaikowsky's Sixth Symphony, a program that ought to display both conductor and orchestra in their best light.

Dr. Stock, also a doctor of music several times over, though he makes no strenuous efforts to be addressed by the title, has another excellent program. It includes Busoni's "Festspiel" Overture, which has not been heard here in some [illegible] Sixth

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS
OCT 29

* * *

Mme. Serge Kus[illegible] to be the box guest of Mr. and Mrs. Rudolph Ganz and Mr. and Mrs. Andrew R. Sherriff, at Orchestra hall this evening at the Boston symphony concert, of which her husband is conductor.

The event is of special interest to Mrs. Sherriff, as it was her father, the late Bernhard Listeman of Boston, who, with Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, helped organize this celebrated orchestra and became its first concertmeister.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO
POST
OCT 30 1929

and Mr. Barry of Minneapolis

Koussevitzky's Orchestra in Fine Concert

By Karleton Hackett.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA under its distinguished conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, gave a concert last evening which was worthy of its great tradition. It was just the sort of program we desired to hear from the men under his direction, modern with the accent strongly on the Russian.

There was, of course, a formal opening with the Vivaldi concerto, ont all of which it was possible for me to hear, since, alas, other artists were giving concerts on the same evening.

The first movement was a striking display of the meticulous precision of the strings that has been developed by that iron discipline. The iron hand within the velvet glove was felt a bit too strongly for the suavity of the old Italian grace. There was, however, no mistaking the fact that a most responsive instrument was in the hands of a master and that what he willed would come forth in tone.

The last part of the Debussy "Nuages" was exquisite in tone color, with an atmospheric quality of delicate charm. A lovely tone picture. The "Fetes" was brilliant with vivid contrasts, sprightly rhythms and the sense of gayety. Very fine playing, yet with a little feeling of display. But it was orchestra virtuosity, and display was to be expected. Then, too, I had had to come in from other sounds and very likely was not fully in the mood.

When it came to Stravinsky's suite from "Petrouchka" we were in another world. Here was the music of Russia with a man to conduct it whose very heart beats were attuned to its lightest pulsations.

We were in Russia, outsiders, to be sure, but living among people to whom this music was a spontaneous expression and thru whom we could be made to feel its power and charm. There was the expansiveness of the Slav, the capacity to forget himself utterly in one mood and in a moment, with no abruptness or self-consciousness skip to another mood a thousand miles away, in a manner of speaking.

The contrasts of mood, of tone coloring and of rhythmic accent were startling, yet we all passed so spontaneously thru these extraordinary experiences that there was no shock, but it all seemed like the most natural thing in the world.

Here was virtuosity, of the conductor and of his men, used solely and with single-mindedness to reveal the meaning of the music. The conductor in his heart believed in the beauty and the power of the music and dared set forth his belief with frankness. It was ever melodic but strange and fragmentary melodies of which only the Slav can know the true meaning.

Mr. Koussevitzky knew it, whether a plaintive little strain or a wild swirl of drunken peasants he made us feel its power and believe in it, too. We of the colder blood may not be able to give way to our feelings so easily or so wholeheartedly, but they not only can, they actually do, and Mr. Koussevitzky is the man to prove it.

It was an interpretive tour de force such as we expected from him, having heard his orchestra before, and it rang true. A something from a foreign land.

The Tschaikowsky "Pathetic" symphony was superb. It was conceived with a depth of feeling and set forth with a breadth and dignity that gave an elemental power. It had in it nothing of the petty nor trivial, nothing of the morbid that comes from the individual's brooding over his private griefs.

Sad it was, but with the sorrow that lies deep in the heart of the poet whose seeing eye has ranged widely and looked upon grief-stricken men. Not for himself, nor for you, nor for any man, but sad that there was so much of pain and hurt in this world for which there seems to be no answer.

Mr. Koussevitzky believes. This music has for him a something that is true and honest, not said as we would say it, but true for the one who did say it and for those of his blood. So true that we of a different blood can believe it as he tells it to us.

The music all meant something. There was magnificent breadth in the main outlines, sustained power rising to a tremendous climax and with exquisite refinement in the endless variety of details. Yet all molded together into one complete yet many sided whole.

The Allegro Con Grazia was fascinating. The Russians alone naturally express themselves in that illusive rhythm. They have it in the folksongs; it is in their bones. The opening of the Allegro Vivace sounded dull and thick in the strings. That may have been the effect desired but it sounded unclear tho he brought it finally to a climax of great power. Perhaps merely a superficial flaw.

The Finale was impressive. A fitting close; sadness yet with the sense of resisting strength, a something universal in the lot of man.

Superb.

Tula Miller in Song Recital at Woman's Club.

Has a soprano voice of pleasing quality, good stage presence and sang well the little it was possible for me to hear.

Mme. Gilderoy Scott in Song Recital at Kimball Hall.

Arrived just in time to hear the encores at the close of the program, whic hdemonstrated that the audience had been pleased. Mme. Scott sang two English folk songs with the true spirit. Told the story with vigor and made the words count. The right idea.

Robert MacDonald played good accompaniments.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS
OCT 30 1929

SYMPHONY HERE FROM BOSTON IN VARIED PROGRAM

After Two Years Orchestra Returns for Concert in Chicago.

BY MAURICE ROSENFELD.

The Boston Symphony orchestra and its masterful conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, after an absence of two years, visited Chicago last evening and gave a varied program of symphonic music at Orchestra hall before a representative audience of music lovers and professional musicians.

There was wide range and variety in the list of compositions presented by this organization, beginning with the Vivaldi concerto in D minor for orchestra with organ, and as edited by Alexander Siloti, proved a very good preface to the rest of the concert numbers.

In this work the clarity of the playing of the different sections of the orchestra, their smoothness in tone and the rigid adherence to form and phrasing were qualities that stood forth.

The two nocturnes "Nuages" and "Fetes" by Debussy were performed with many nuances in tone colorings and in dynamics, keeping the works in the hazy, indefinite tonal shades which their titles suggest.

The orchestral suite from the ballet "Petrouchka" by Strawinsky, had much of the Slav manner of melody and a certain riotous excitement in tempo and tonal mass, to suggest the lower class of the Russian people during the czaristic regimes.

There were flashes of tone colors, there were sharp rhythms in the dance sections and there was also a fanciful, weird fusion between the different instruments of the orchestra. In order to give the composition a certain realism, in this ballet music, besides the regular symphony orchestral scoring, a piano, xylophone, two harps, glockenspiel, cymbals, triangle, various drums, celesta, tam-tam and other unusual instruments were used by Strawinsky and the effects were often bizarre and extraordinary.

Leader in Control.

Mr. Koussevitzky at all times held the big orchestra, it numbers nearly twenty more players than our Chicago orchestra, under absolute control and they played this set of pieces with a great show of virtuosity.

The big number of the concert, however, was the rendition of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, No. 6, in B minor, in which the reading given by Conductor Koussevitzky was somewhat a personal definition of Tschaikowsky's morbid, inconsolable moods, and through the four movements of this work there was a gripping earnestness, an almost despairing note, a frenzy of emotion and intense passion.

These sensations perhaps were not felt by the listener, for there still remained an impersonal feeling in the interpretation which Mr. Koussevitzky gave to this symphony.

The orchestra was acutely responsive throughout the four movements, playing the quiet lyric parts, the five-fourths waltz, with graceful tone and taken at a great speed, and in this section the tone volume mounted to massive power.

The last movement of the symphony again brought out the lamentations of the poet expressed in the tonal web of a symphonic setting.

Never in its former concerts in Chicago did the Boston Symphony orchestra play with greater virtuosity or with finer musical qualities as at this concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD EXAMINER
OCT 30 1929

Power and Colorful Tone in Boston Symphony Program

BY GLENN DILLARD GUNN.

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid one of their infrequent but stimulating visits to Chicago last night and again it is made plain why the community that pays him to be its guest should delight to honor him. He has all the qualities that tend to keep alive a love of music that is, perhaps, acquired rather than native. It is not remarkable, then, that even Harvard—which we know musically only through its glee club—should have been moved to honor itself by conferring upon him an honorary degree, and that the musical public of Boston regards him as one of the best reasons for the worthwhileness of life on the Atlantic seaboard.

He is, of course, a great dramatist of the symphony, an artist of true orchestral imagination, a master of color and of contrast in all its myriad inflections, whether instrumental or dynamic. Hence every contact with his art provokes an instant reaction. He plays with the orchestra and upon the emotional and sensuous responses of his listeners. But his is, nevertheless, a sincere and, I am sure, an essentially simple nature. His own reactions to music are of the emotions and the sensibilities, basically dramatic rather than purely musical.

* * *

THAT, at least, would seem to be the explanation of his treatment of the Vivaldi concerto in D major which opened the program. This is purely a classic piece, dedicated to general excellence of style rather than to detail of expression. He made it a study in the sensuous values of opposed sonorities. He called for a vigor of string tone more eloquent than beautiful, for contrasts that expressed more than they defined, and this without adding anything to the beauty or the elegance of this ancient music, nor even to its essential meanings.

But if his account of a classic Italian seemed a bit distorted, his approach to the greatest of the modern Frenchmen was far more sympathetic. Debussy was drawn upon for the second group. His nocturnes —"Clouds" and "Festivals"—were played with qualities of imagination that far exceeded the bounds of mere orchestral technic. The stately procession of vague and formless clouds across the immensity of the heavens was described with rhythms of measured power, with colors of the most delicate subtlety, marred only by the too strident tone of the English horn. As for the "Festivals," the riot of tone evoked in the prefatory division of this remarkable work was, I am sure, more Slavic than Gallic. But the remote fanfare that heralds the tumultuous march was a miracle of dynamic restraint used to define in music the element which in the drama is called suspense.

This was the great moment of the program. For that which followed was, in part, not music at all, and in part very poor music indeed. The suite drawn from Stravinsky's ballet, "Petrouchka," is an astonishing study in descriptive acoustic effect. Its humor, its moments of pathos, its colors, barbaric and bizarre, burst forth from the orchestra with a relentless vitality of impulse that was overwhelming.

But not the sincerity nor yet the magic of Koussevitzky's baton can translate the bathos of Tschaikowsky's last and most self-conscious sympathy into something noble. He has improved the instrumentation. He has refined the colors. He has persuaded himself of the nobility of the themes. But he is not able to make the first movement anything else than feeble. There was enough charm and grace in his version of the five-four waltz to make one regret its needless repetitions, and he surely made the scherzo march a thrilling moment even though the composer repeated the thrill until it thrilled no more.

* * *

THE Boston orchestra deserves its distinguished name among the celebrated symphonic bodies of the world. It is splendidly disciplined, and the material—notably in the winds and brasses—is very fine indeed. The strings, the double basses excepted, lack elegance. Such momentary faults of ensemble as the performance developed must be excused on the grounds of the unaccustomed acoustics of Orchestra Hall. It was quite plain that the men could not always hear each other. Presently they learned to supplement the ear with the eye and then the ensemble improved.

The audience, while not so large as that which welcomed the Bostonians on their former visit, was enthusiastic beyond measure. Dr. Koussevitzky's fellow Russians cheered him and called out to him in his own tongue. Nor were the other elements among his listeners less cordial in their approval.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO
TRIBUNE
OCT 30 1929

Boston's Symphony Visits and Pleases Chicago Audience

BY EDWARD MOORE.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, making a brief tour from its home port to the middle west, paused at Orchestra hall last night to give a concert, and presumably is on its way this morning. It is one of the famous orchestras of the east, as all good music patrons know, and its conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, has in a few brief seasons made himself one of the favored directors of America, a favor marked by fervid applause at all times and the recent acquisition of his doctorate of music.

There are quite a few external differences between this gifted organization from the east and the Chicago Symphony. The programs last night bore Boston wrappers and Philip Hale's notes, but mostly Chicago advertisements. The seating arrangement of the men is quite different, and Dr. Koussevitzky permits loud tuning of instruments before and after all numbers, even when his hand is raised to suppress applause.

There are some internal differences as well, though these are frequently items of manner rather than matter. The orchestra is a fine toned, responsive, and flexible organization, and Dr. Koussevitzky is a conductor of stress and fortitude. He prefers and gets striking contracts of volume and tempo; he drives to a point where at times his effects would seem to be angular rather than curved. To change the figure, it may not be entirely accurate to say that he serves his music raw with a knife, but he apparently likes it rather rare.

This is intended to be descriptive and not in the least reproachful. At times his method leads to rather splendid effects. His performance of Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" Suite, for instance, was gorgeous, and so was the last movement of Tschaikowsky's Sixth Symphony. The weakness of the method lies in the fact that there is an occasional feeling of the orchestra being driven to its tonal limit and left without reserves to draw upon.

The program consisted of the Vivaldi Concerto in D minor, part of which had to be missed because of another event, Debussy's Two Nocturnes, familiar in the Chicago Symphony programs, the "Petrouchka" Suite, new here as an orchestral number, and that grand old piece of highly [illegible]dramma, the Tschaikowsky [illegible] no soloist.

[illegible]anwhile offer- [illegible] soprano [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD EXAMINER
OCT 13 1929

THAT the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be brought to Chicago is theannouncement from H. E. Voegeli, manager of Orchestra Hall. The orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will give a concert Tuesday evening, October 29 at Orchestra Hall.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD EXAMINER
OCT 22 1929

Dr. Serge Koussevitzy and the eminent Boston Symphony Orchestra, when they visit us a week hence, will play the neurotic sixth symphony, prefacing it with Vivaldi, Debussy and Scriabine.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS
OCT 26

MUSICAL NEWS AND COMMENT ON HAPPENINGS

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Be Heard Here Tuesday Evening.

BY MAURICE ROSENFELD.

THE most important item of the immediate musical season is the concert scheduled for Tuesday evening at Orchestra hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conductor.

First known as a virtuoso on the double bass, the musician soon left the solo field for the more active work of the conductor, and after some experiences with symphony orchestras abroad came to Boston as the conductor of this, the oldest symphony orchestra in America, and here in five years he has established himself as one of the great conductors and musicians of the country.

The program for this event will be found in another column.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO
TRIBUNE

* *

Chance to Compare Orchestras.

There will be a chance to compare the symphony orchestras of Chicago and Boston this week. The first will appear according to its usual schedule, a "pop" on Thursday and its regular pair on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at Orchestra hall, plus a trip to Mandel hall for good measure early in the week. The second will appear also at Orchestra hall Tuesday evening.

Dr. Koussevitsky—he is a doctor of music, in case you have not heard—will direct Vivaldi's Concerto Grosso for organ and orchestra, Debussy's Two Nocturnes, the suite from Stravinky's "Petrouchka," and Tschaikowsky's Sixth Symphony, a program that ought to display both conductor and orchestra in their best light.

Dr. Stock, also a doctor of music several times over, though he makes no strenuous efforts to be addressed by the title, has another excellent program. It includes Busoni's "Festspiel" Overture, which has not been heard here in some time; Miaskowsky's Sixth Symphony, and Sibelius' "Finlandia." Ennio Bolognini, the new first cellist, will be the first soloist of the season, playing the Lalo Concerto. He is also due to play the obbligato in the popular program Thursday night for Massenet's "Les Erinnyes."

late [illegible] who, with Maj. [illegible] helped organize this celebrated orchestra and became its first concertmeister.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO
POST
OCT 30 1929

and Mr. Barry of Minneapolis

Koussevitzky's Orchestra in Fine Concert

By Karleton Hackett.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA under its distinguished conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, gave a concert last evening which was worthy of its great tradition. It was just the sort of program we desired to hear from the men under his direction, modern with the accent strongly on the Russian.

There was, of course, a formal opening with the Vivaldi concerto, ont all of which it was possible for me to hear, since, alas, other artists were giving concerts on the same evening.

The first movement was a striking display of the meticulous precision of the strings that has been developed by that iron discipline. The iron hand within the velvet glove was felt a bit too strongly for the suavity of the old Italian grace. There was, however, no mistaking the fact that a most responsive instrument was in the hands of a master and that what he willed would come forth in tone.

The last part of the Debussy "Nuages" was exquisite in tone color, with an atmospheric quality of delicate charm. A lovely tone picture. The "Fetes" was brilliant with vivid contrasts, sprightly rhythms and the sense of gayety. Very fine playing, yet with a little feeling of display. But it was orchestra virtuosity, and display was to be expected. Then, too, I had had to come in from other sounds and very likely was not fully in the mood.

When it came to Stravinsky's suite from "Petrouchka" we were in another world. Here was the music of Russia with a man to conduct it whose very heart beats were attuned to its lightest pulsations.

We were in Russia, outsiders, to be sure, but living among people to whom this music was a spontaneous expression and thru whom we could be made to feel its power and charm. There was the expansiveness of the Slav, the capacity to forget himself utterly in one mood and in a moment, with no abruptness or self-consciousness skip to another mood a thousand miles away, in a manner of speaking.

The contrasts of mood, of tone coloring and of rhythmic accent were startling, yet we all passed so spontaneously thru these extraordinary experiences that there was no shock, but it all seemed like the most natural thing in the world.

Here was virtuosity, of the conductor and of his men, used solely and with single-mindedness to reveal the meaning of the music. The conductor in his heart believed in the beauty and the power of the music and dared set forth his belief with frankness. It was ever melodic but strange and fragmentary melodies of which only the Slav can know the true meaning.

Mr. Koussevitzky knew it, whether a plaintive little strain or a wild swirl of drunken peasants he made us feel its power and believe in it, too. We of the colder blood may not be able to give way to our feelings so easily or so wholeheartedly, but they not only can, they actually do, and Mr. Koussevitzky is the man to prove it.

It was an interpretive tour de force such as we expected from him, having heard his orchestra before, and it rang true. A something from a foreign land.

The Tschaikowsky "Pathetic" symphony was superb. It was conceived with a depth of feeling and set forth with a breadth and dignity that gave an elemental power. It had in it nothing of the petty nor trivial, nothing of the morbid that comes from the individual's brooding over his private griefs.

Sad it was, but with the sorrow that lies deep in the heart of the poet whose seeing eye has ranged widely and looked upon grief-stricken men. Not for himself, nor for you, nor for any man, but sad that there was so much of pain and hurt in this world for which there seems to be no answer.

Mr. Koussevitzky believes. This music has for him a something that is true and honest, not said as we would say it, but true for the one who did say it and for those of his blood. So true that we of a different blood can believe it as he tells it to us.

The music all meant something. There was magnificent breadth in the main outlines, sustained power rising to a tremendous climax and with exquisite refinement in the endless variety of details. Yet all molded together into one complete yet many sided whole.

The Allegro Con Grazia was fascinating. The Russians alone naturally express themselves in that illusive rhythm. They have it in the folksongs; it is in their bones. The opening of the Allegro Vivace sounded dull and thick in the strings. That may have been the effect desired but it sounded unclear tho he brought it finally to a climax of great power. Perhaps merely a superficial flaw.

The Finale was impressive. A fitting close; sadness yet with the sense of resisting strength, a something universal in the lot of man.

Superb.

Tula Miller in Song Recital at Woman's Club.

Has a soprano voice of pleasing quality, good stage presence and sang well the little it was possible for me to hear.

Mme. Gilderoy Scott in Song Recital at Kimball Hall.

Arrived just in time to hear the encores at the close of the program, whic hdemonstrated that the audience had been pleased. Mme. Scott sang two English folk songs with the true spirit. Told the story with vigor and made the words count. The right idea.

Robert MacDonald played good accompaniments.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS
OCT 30 1929

SYMPHONY HERE FROM BOSTON IN VARIED PROGRAM

After Two Years Orchestra Returns for Concert in Chicago.

BY MAURICE ROSENFELD.

The Boston Symphony orchestra and its masterful conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, after an absence of two years, visited Chicago last evening and gave a varied program of symphonic music at Orchestra hall before a representative audience of music lovers and professional musicians.

There was wide range and variety in the list of compositions presented by this organization, beginning with the Vivaldi concerto in D minor for orchestra with organ, and as edited by Alexander Siloti, proved a very good preface to the rest of the concert numbers.

In this work the clarity of the playing of the different sections of the orchestra, their smoothness in tone and the rigid adherence to form and phrasing were qualities that stood forth.

The two nocturnes "Nuages" and "Fetes" by Debussy were performed with many nuances in tone colorings and in dynamics, keeping the works in the hazy, indefinite tonal shades which their titles suggest.

The orchestral suite from the ballet "Petrouchka" by Strawinsky, had much of the Slav manner of melody and a certain riotous excitement in tempo and tonal mass, to suggest the lower class of the Russian people during the czaristic regimes.

There were flashes of tone colors, there were sharp rhythms in the dance sections and there was also a fanciful, weird fusion between the different instruments of the orchestra. In order to give the composition a certain realism, in this ballet music, besides the regular symphony orchestral scoring, a piano, xylophone, two harps, glockenspiel, cymbals, triangle, various drums, celesta, tam-tam and other unusual instruments were used by Strawinsky and the effects were often bizarre and extraordinary.

Leader in Control.

Mr. Koussevitzky at all times held the big orchestra, it numbers nearly twenty more players than our Chicago orchestra, under absolute control and they played this set of pieces with a great show of virtuosity.

The big number of the concert, however, was the rendition of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, No. 6, in B minor, in which the reading given by Conductor Koussevitzky was somewhat a personal definition of Tschaikowsky's morbid, inconsolable moods, and through the four movements of this work there was a gripping earnestness, an almost despairing note, a frenzy of emotion and intense passion.

These sensations perhaps were not felt by the listener, for there still remained an impersonal feeling in the interpretation which Mr. Koussevitzky gave to this symphony.

The orchestra was acutely responsive throughout the four movements, playing the quiet lyric parts, the five-fourths waltz, with graceful tone and taken at a great speed, and in this section the tone volume mounted to massive power.

The last movement of the symphony again brought out the lamentations of the poet expressed in the tonal web of a symphonic setting.

Never in its former concerts in Chicago did the Boston Symphony orchestra play with greater virtuosity or with finer musical qualities as at this concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD EXAMINER
OCT 30 1929

Power and Colorful Tone in Boston Symphony Program

BY GLENN DILLARD GUNN.

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid one of their infrequent but stimulating visits to Chicago last night and again it is made plain why the community that pays him to be its guest should delight to honor him. He has all the qualities that tend to keep alive a love of music that is, perhaps, acquired rather than native. It is not remarkable, then, that even Harvard—which we know musically only through its glee club—should have been moved to honor itself by conferring upon him an honorary degree, and that the musical public of Boston regards him as one of the best reasons for the worthwhileness of life on the Atlantic seaboard.

He is, of course, a great dramatist of the symphony, an artist of true orchestral imagination, a master of color and of contrast in all its myriad inflections, whether instrumental or dynamic. Hence every contact with his art provokes an instant reaction. He plays with the orchestra and upon the emotional and sensuous responses of his listeners. But his is, nevertheless, a sincere and, I am sure, an essentially simple nature. His own reactions to music are of the emotions and the sensibilities, basically dramatic rather than purely musical.

* * *

THAT, at least, would seem to be the explanation of his treatment of the Vivaldi concerto in D major, which opened the program. This is purely a classic piece, dedicated to general excellence of style rather than to detail of expression. He made it a study in the sensuous values of opposed sonorities. He called for a vigor of string tone more eloquent than beautiful, for contrasts that expressed more than they defined, and this without adding anything to the beauty or the elegance of this ancient music, nor even to its essential meanings.

But if his account of a classic Italian seemed a bit distorted, his approach to the greatest of the modern Frenchmen was far more sympathetic. Debussy was drawn upon for the second group. His nocturnes —"Clouds" and "Festivals"—were played with qualities of imagination that far exceeded the bounds of mere orchestral technic. The stately procession of vague and formless clouds across the immensity of the heavens was described with rhythms of measured power, with colors of the most delicate subtlety, marred only by the too strident tone of the English horn. As for the "Festivals," the riot of tone evoked in the prefatory division of this remarkable work was, I am sure, more Slavic than Gallic. But the remote fanfare that heralds the tumultuous march was a miracle of dynamic restraint used to define in music the element which in the drama is called suspense.

This was the great moment of the program. For that which followed was, in part, not music at all, and in part very poor music indeed. The suite drawn from Stravinsky's ballet, "Petrouchka," is an astonishing study in descriptive acoustic effect. Its humor, its moments of pathos, its colors, barbaric and bizarre, burst forth from the orchestra with a relentless vitality of impulse that was overwhelming.

But not the sincerity nor yet the magic of Koussevitzky's baton can translate the bathos of Tschaikowsky's last and most self-conscious sympathy into something noble. He has improved the instrumentation. He has refined the colors. He has persuaded himself of the nobility of the themes. But he is not able to make the first movement anything else than feeble. There was enough charm and grace in his version of the five-four waltz to make one regret its needless repetitions, and he surely made the scherzo march a thrilling moment even though the composer repeated the thrill until it thrilled no more.

* * *

THE Boston orchestra deserves its distinguished name among the celebrated symphonic bodies of the world. It is splendidly disciplined, and the material—notably in the winds and brasses—is very fine indeed. The strings, the double basses excepted, lack elegance. Such momentary faults of ensemble as the performance developed must be excused on the grounds of the unaccustomed acoustics of Orchestra Hall. It was quite plain that the men could not always hear each other. Presently they learned to supplement the ear with the eye and then the ensemble improved.

The audience, while not so large as that which welcomed the Bostonians on their former visit, was enthusiastic beyond measure. Dr. Koussevitzky's fellow Russians cheered him and called out to him in his own tongue. Nor were the other elements among his listeners less cordial in their approval.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO
TRIBUNE
OCT 30 1929

Boston's Symphony Visits and Pleases Chicago Audience

BY EDWARD MOORE.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, making a brief tour from its home port to the middle west, paused at Orchestra hall last night to give a concert, and presumably is on its way this morning. It is one of the famous orchestras of the east, as all good music patrons know, and its conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, has in a few brief seasons made himself one of the favored directors of America, a favor marked by fervid applause at all times and the recent acquisition of his doctorate of music.

There are quite a few external differences between this gifted organization from the east and the Chicago Symphony. The programs last night bore Boston wrappers and Philip Hale's notes, but mostly Chicago advertisements. The seating arrangement of the men is quite different, and Dr. Koussevitzky permits loud tuning of instruments before and after all numbers, even when his hand is raised to suppress applause.

There are some internal differences as well, though these are frequently items of manner rather than matter. The orchestra is a fine toned, responsive, and flexible organization, and Dr. Koussevitzky is a conductor of stress and fortitude. He prefers and gets striking contracts of volume and tempo; he drives to a point where at times his effects would seem to be angular rather than curved. To change the figure, it may not be entirely accurate to say that he serves his music raw with a knife, but he apparently likes it rather rare.

This is intended to be descriptive and not in the least reproachful. At times his method leads to rather splendid effects. His performance of Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" Suite, for instance, was gorgeous, and so was the last movement of Tschaikowsky's Sixth Symphony. The weakness of the method lies in the fact that there is an occasional feeling of the orchestra being driven to its tonal limit and left without reserves to draw upon.

The program consisted of the Vivaldi Concerto in D minor, part of which had to be missed because of another event, Debussy's Two Nocturnes, familiar in the Chicago Symphony programs, the "Petrouchka" Suite, new here as an orchestral number, and that grand old piece of highly [illegible]dra[illegible]ma, the Tschaikowsky [illegible] no soloist.

[illegible]anwhile offer- [illegible], sopra[illegible] et

143

CHICAGO DAILY NEWS

O DAILY

OCTOBER 30, 1929.

M

SYMPHONY HERE FROM BOSTON IN VARIED PROGRAM

After Two Years Orchestra Returns for Concert in Chicago.

BY MAURICE ROSENFELD.

The Boston Symphony orchestra and its masterful conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, after an absence of two years, visited Chicago last evening and gave a varied program of symphonic music at Orchestra hall before a representative audience of music lovers and professional musicians.

There was wide range and variety in the list of compositions presented by this organization, beginning with the Vivaldi concerto in D minor for orchestra with organ, and as edited by Alexander Siloti, proved a very good preface to the rest of the concert numbers.

In this work the clarity of the playing of the different sections of the orchestra, their smoothness in tone and the rigid adherence to form and phrasing were qualities that stood forth.

The two nocturnes "Nuages" and "Fetes" by Debussy were performed with many nuances in tone colorings and in dynamics, keeping the works in the hazy, indefinite tonal shades which their titles suggest.

The orchestral suite from the ballet "Petrouchka" by Strawinsky, had much of the Slav manner of melody and a certain riotous excitement in tempo and tonal mass, to suggest the lower class of the Russian people during the czaristic regimes.

There were flashes of tone colors, there were sharp rhythms in the dance sections and there was also a fanciful, weird fusion between the different instruments of the orchestra. In order to give the composition a certain realism, in this ballet music, besides the regular symphony orchestral scoring, a piano, xylophone, two harps, glockenspiel, cymbals, triangle, various drums, celesta, tam-tam and other unusual instruments were used by Strawinsky and the effects were often bizarre and extraordinary.

Leader in Control.

Mr. Koussevitzky at all times held the big orchestra, it numbers nearly twenty more players than our Chicago orchestra, under absolute control and they played this set of pieces with a great show of virtuosity.

The big number of the concert, however, was the rendition of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, No. 6, in B minor, in which the reading given by Conductor Koussevitzky was somewhat a personal definition of Tschaikowsky's morbid, inconsolable moods, and through the four movements of this work there was a gripping earnestness, an almost despairing note, a frenzy of emotion and intense passion.

These sensations perhaps were not felt by the listener, for there still remained an impersonal feeling in the interpretation which Mr. Koussevitzky gave to this symphony.

The orchestra was acutely responsive throughout the four movements, playing the quiet lyric parts, the five-fourths waltz, with graceful tone and light quality, while the scherzo was

Koussevitzky's Orchestra in Fine Concert

POST

By Karleton Hackett.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA under its distinguished conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, gave a concert last evening which was worthy of its great tradition. It was just the sort of program we desired to hear from the men under his direction, modern with the accent strongly on the Russian.

There was, of course, a formal opening with the Vivaldi concerto, ont all of which it was possible for me to hear, since, alas, other artists were giving concerts on the same evening.

The first movement was a striking display of the meticulous precision of the strings that has been developed by that iron discipline. The iron hand within the velvet glove was felt a bit too strongly for the suavity of the old Italian grace. There was, however, no mistaking the fact that a most responsive instrument was in the hands of a master and that what he willed would come forth in tone.

The last part of the Debussy "Nuages" was exquisite in tone color, with an atmospheric quality of delicate charm. A lovely tone picture. The "Fetes" was brilliant with vivid contrasts, sprightly rhythms and the sense of gayety. Very fine playing, yet with a little feeling of display. But it was orchestra virtuosity, and display was to be expected. Then, too, I had had to come in from other sounds and very likely was not fully in the mood.

When it came to Stravinsky's suite from "Petrouchka" we were in another world. Here was the music of Russia with a man to conduct it whose very heart beats were attuned to its lightest pulsations.

We were in Russia, outsiders, to be sure, but living among people to whom this music was a spontaneous expression and thru whom we could be made to feel its power and charm. There was the expansiveness of the Slav, the capacity to forget himself utterly in one mood and in a moment, with no abruptness or self-consciousness skip to another mood a thousand miles away, in a manner of speaking.

The contrasts of mood, of tone coloring and of rhythmic accent were startling, yet we all passed so spontaneously thru these extraordinary experiences that there was no shock, but it all seemed like the most natural thing in the world.

Here was virtuosity, of the conductor and of his men, used solely and with single-mindedness to reveal the meaning of the music. The conductor in his heart believed in the beauty and the power of the music and dared set forth his belief with frankness. It was ever melodic but strange and fragmentary melodies of which only the Slav can know the true meaning.

Mr. Koussevitzky knew it, whether a plaintive little strain or a wild swirl of drunken peasants he made us feel its power and believe in it, too. We of the colder blood may not be able to give way to our feelings so easily or so wholeheartedly, but they not only can, they actually do, and Mr. Koussevitzky is the man to prove it.

It was an interpretive tour de force such as we expected from him, having heard his orchestra before, and it rang true. A something from a foreign land.

The Tschaikowsky "Pathetic" symphony was superb. It was conceived with a depth of feeling and set forth with a breadth and dignity that gave an elemental power. It had in it nothing of the petty nor trivial, nothing of the morbid that comes from the individual's brooding over his private griefs.

Sad it was, but with the sorrow that lies deep in the heart of the poet whose seeing eye has ranged widely and looked upon grief-stricken men. Not for himself, nor for you, nor for any man, but sad that there was so much of pain and hurt in this world for which there seems to be no answer.

Mr. Koussevitzky believes. This music has for him a something that is true and honest, not said as we would say it, but true for the one who did say it and for those of his blood. So true that we of a different blood can believe it as he tells it to us.

The music all meant something. There was magnificent breadth in the main outlines, sustained power rising to a tremendous climax and with exquisite refinement in the endless variety of details. Yet all molded together into one complete yet many sided whole.

The Allegro Con Grazia was fascinating. The Russians alone naturally express themselves in that illusive rhythm. They have it in the folksongs; it is in their bones. The opening of the Allegro Vivace sounded dull and thick in the strings. That may have been the effect desired but it sounded unclear tho he brought it finally to a climax of great power. Perhaps merely a superficial flaw.

The Finale was impressive. A fitting close; sadness yet with the sense of resisting strength, a something universal in the lot of man.

Superb.

CHICAGO EVENING AMERICAN
WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY RENEWS LAST YEAR'S SUCCESS

BY HERMAN DEVRIES.

Koussevitzky arranged his program for last night's concert at Orchestra Hall very much as a skilled playwright introduces his hero—he begins without the introduction of the principal characters and makes his audience wait for a fitting climax to increase what is termed in technical parlance, the "suspense."

We who listened to the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday found our emotions treated in much the same manner. Remembering his well-nigh sensational triumph of last year we were prepared almost to leap from our seats at the first pause—but when the Vivaldi concerto in D minor, arranged by Alexander Siloti for orchestra with organ, came to its end applause was hearty but polite.

VIVALDI FAILS TO REGISTER.

At the end of the program, however, applause became a prolonged ovation, so warm so spontaneous, shared equally by boxes, galleries and parquet that last year's victory was renewed and Koussevitzky may again be assured that he holds Chicago in the palm of his hand as he does his obedient men.

Vivaldi always leaves us cold. We liked its sturdy rhythms, if you will, but found the strings in full tension somewhat boisterous and rough, lacking in the sonority which is surely not out of place even in a classic.

But we took fire slowly with the public, warming to the fine, imaginative interpretation of the Debussy "Nuages" and the brilliant "Fetes." With the latter, however, we disagreed somewhat, as we found the dynamics and rhythmic differences too marked, too military in precision and sharpness of outline. "Unless," as my neighbor said, "it was a military fete."

And then came the great moments of the evening—Strawinsky's Petrouchka suite and the Tschaikowsky sixth symphony in B minor.

I have never heard the Petrouchka played better. . .there were revealed all the richness, the glowing brilliance of the orchestral ensemble, its technical virtuosity and especially the gorgeous timbre of its wind instruments, notably the horns and tuba. . .It was a glittering, gaudy piece of orchestra fooling, a symphony of keenest cunning in construction and orchestral combinations.

GREAT CLIMAX COMES.

The great climax came, of course, with the Tschaikowsky. . .It was nothing less than magnificent, calling forth all the manifold resources of the instruments, and the inexhaustible interpretative genius of Koussevitzky.

Men and master shared the audience's ovation and, as usual, nobody wanted to go home. . .The house was emptied at nearly 11 o'clock!

Two other music events claimed our attention. Tula Miller's recital at the Chicago Woman's Club Auditorium and Mme. Gilderoy Scott at Kimball Hall, in an English program.

Miss Miller was liked best by this reviewer in the Beethoven Wonne der Wehmuth, wherewith she displayed an ingratiating mezza voce and excellent vocal style. She is well trained. Mme. Scott was heard in the Gustav Holst songs "Indra," "God of Storm and Battle" and "Varfuna, the Father-God" from his Vedric Hymns. Her voice, too, is best when used at half strength, but when full tone is needed as in the "God of Storm," she is apt to "sharp" . . .and that, of course, detracts from the artistic value of her performance.

Barnes to Speak.

Julius H. Barnes, chairman of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, was to speak on "The International Aspect of American Business" at the weekly meeting of the Chicago Association of Commerce today at the Hotel La Salle.

Music Lovers Here Greet Boston Symphony at Mosque

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky Leads Orchestra to Triumph In Initial Appearance of Season; Will Render "Fire Bird" This Afternoon.

There are orchestras and orchestras, and conductors and conductors—and then there is the Boston Symphony and Serge Koussevitzky, and last night at the Mosque, a large discriminating audience was present to give director and men their appreciation.

It is a marvelous machine that Boston possesses, pliant, sonorous, perfectly balanced and with a range of dynamics that sounds as if another sfozando might be added to an already overwhelming fortissimo, should an extra accent be resuired. In other words, a triple F is volume within the timbre of instruments and there is no ruined tone through exaggeration. Isn't that as it should be?

One always admires the richness of the Boston strings, but then there are little parts that come singing through that also deserve approbation, as to wit, those cooling flutes and those warm tinted clarinets, (a clarinet without tone is a ghastly tool) and here and there that piquant oboe—as in the Stravinsky ballet. Yes, it's gorgeous body tone and one wonders if there is a more virtuosi band, as was demonstrated in the second movement of the Beethoven in apogee.

Rises to Heights.

Dr. Koussevitzky prepared a program that was more than that cursed thing "profitable"; at times it was downright exciting and in the "Petrouchki" (a first time in Pittsburgh) he rose to great heights. He always has a quality of restraint, and if he doesn't rubato it so much the better for the composition—and the audience. In the opening Vivaldi played en suite, we heard the full voiced strings fuguing it with the utmost clarity. Indeed it was given with almost chamber music sharpness and smartness and you caught subject and counter-subjected (in the first movement, at least) and the whole spread out to a moving al-largando stretta. The second movement with its charming first fiddle figures was broad song and the third movement might have been a toccata had the metronome been shoved up another notch.

There are people who thought the prelude to "Lohengrin" attenuated and perhaps it was, but that very tenuous quality gave it an etheral effect. Certainly there was a shimmer to the strings and when the flutes and horns came in, on that long sweep it was a haunting moment. At that, do you suppose that it will be possible that Wagner like Bernard Shaw will be known to the posterities for his magnificent prefaces? He has so many fine forewords (and not too loud on this, but they are sometimes better than the dramatic content) and "Lohengrin" is one of the most translucent preludes we know.

Petrouchka Outstanding.

As far as some of us were concerned "Petrouchka" was the outstanding work. Not because it was the best played (and yet we hesitate here and think perhaps it was) but because it sang a new note, and if it is a familiar note and replete with the monotonies of modernism, at least it was ravishing in instrumentation. And what a wit Igor Stravinsky is, and how he out-Strausses Strauss in the matter of trick solo leads? His bi-tonolities are commonplace today and yet in the "Nurses' Dance" and the roaring "Masqueraders" they were most welcome. To us that was a grand work, and on Dr. Koussevitzky's part, a grand piece of conducting.

There is one thing certain, neither the orchestra nor the conductor go in for mawkish sentimentality when they play Beethoven. They make him lusty and virile and if there have to be "Fate-knocks" and other programatic nonsense, those things are left to the annotator, and the orchestra concerns itself with giving a finished reading, as one found in the first movement. That singing second was done with every bit of phrasing possible, and whether it was con varia or recapitulation, every fragment was something to hear. If the allegro was a slow-footed sherzo, at least it was sane and free from stuntism.

Good as last night's program was, this afternoon's is even better. Here you will find Strauss rubbing S's with Stravinsky and Dr. Koussevitzky's conducting of both will be a joy. Don't miss this "Fire Bird."

Concert-Chronicle

Privately—from Chicago

THIS department has leave to quote a paragraph or two from a private letter about the visit, last week, to Chicago of Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra. The letter comes from a Chicogoan of large experience in opera-house and concert-hall:

I notice that one of the local critics in reviewing the concert of the Boston Symphony here last night spoke of the enthusiasm displayed by the large number of Koussevitzky's compatriots in the audience. Probably so, but I noticed that the persons seated about me—obviously American and excellent Chicagoans unhyphenated—wore their palms red applauding your superb band.

And why not? It was like a breeze of refreshing air on a hot day of summer to hear the Boston men. It was more than good, this vitality, aliveness, and stimulation; while if one is vexed at Koussevitzky for his "readings," no one unbiased can say he puts the auditors to sleep on the safe and sane assurance that bones will not be disturbed.

The evening was a growing triuumph. The applause after the Stravinsky number threatened to become an ovation of riotous measure, not due to a handful of Russians only. But the Chaikovsky "Pathetic" became an anti-climax. One regretted that Koussevitzky chose this; for in this day and age the thing is so overdone. Orchestral audiences in cities like this look for something else. He should have given Chicago one of his magnificent Strauss numbers and then there would have been no holding the natives.

Herald Nov 4

FOUNDED 1900 BY CHARLES F. FRENCH

FRENCH
PUBLISHER

MUSICAL LEADER

4839
5408
CICLEAD CHICAGO

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

CHICAGO NOV 4

JR ATTENTION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH A Y'S ISSUE OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

New Work Played by Boston Symphony

By MARTA S. MANNING

Boston, Oct. 26, 1929.

The Friday afternoon audience at Symphony Hall was delighted with Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor (for orchestra with organ), interested by Josten's Symphonic Poem "Jungle," which received its world premiere and all together absorbed by the "Pathetic" Symphony of Tschaikowsky, always a favorite.

There was the usual quiver of excitement and tenseness before Mr. Josten's new work. Interest was gained at once by the moving, primitive Voodoo rhythm with which it opens; it was held through the successive thematic developments to the final overwhelming lion's roar. A round of applause, more cordial than that accorded most "first times" in Boston, broke forth at the conclusion of the work and compelled Mr. Josten's appearance upon the stage beside Dr. Koussevitsky.

"Jungle" was inspired by a painting, "Forêt exotique," by the French artist Henri Rousseau. It was composed in 1928 and is written in Sonata-Allegro form with an extended coda. To quote Mr. Josten, his symphonic poem "tries to portray the emotions and sensations which assail a white man entering the jungle, with its lures, terrors, primitive love and ferocious death."

The Tschaikowsky symphony received a masterly interpretation at the hands of Dr. Koussevitsky. The second movement especially was so faultlessly and feelingly played that, at its conclusion, a spontaneous acknowledgement sounded out. Both conductor and men were as one, and all the delicate shadings of the work were brought out.

The next pair of concerts will be given at Symphony Hall, November 8 and 9, since the orchestra will be giving a series of concerts in the West during the week of November 4.

FOUNDED 1900 BY CHARLES F. FRENCH

FLORENCE FRENCH
EDITOR AND PUBLISHER

MUSICAL LEADER

E. F. SMITH
J. DEMERATH
F. M. WARD

TELEPHONE 4839
HARRISON 5408
CABLE ADDRESS: MUSICLEAD CHICAGO

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

SUBSCRIPTION: $3.00 FOR YEAR
CANADIAN $4.00 FOR YEAR
FOREIGN $4.50 FOR YEAR

CHICAGO. 501 McCORMICK BUILDING
332 SO. MICHIGAN AVE

NOV 11 1929

YOUR ATTENTION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH APPEARED IN LAST THURSDAY'S ISSUE OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

Showmanship-Plus

Boston Players and Mr. Koussevitzky Visit Chicago and Attract Large Audience to Orchestra Hall

"Ohs," "Ahs," and sighs of rapturous delight from weak women in the audience, and whole hearted approval from the men followed the performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky who was born in Tiev. He acquired a great reputation abroad as a double bass player, and ultimately obtained the position of conductor of the famous organization founded by Colonel Higginson in the "Hub" many years ago. The symphony players stopped in Chicago Tuesday of last week and gave this city a taste of their quality. Once in a while it is good to see what the other fellow is doing, and if he gives you a bit of thrill so much the better.

The Boston Symphony is Koussevitzky and when first entrusted with the directorship five years ago he must have been a revelation to New Englanders, accustomed as they were to the quiet leadership of the French conductor, Monteux. Koussevitzky is personality,—plus. One forgets the orchestra players in watching the conductor play with them and with his audience. He holds both forces in the hollow of the two hands he uses so expertly and so expressively. We were seated at just the right angle to follow his gestures, pantomime and extraordinary mobile countenance. One sensed his complete control of the situation. He is a polished actor of erect figure, cameo-like countenance, sartorial perfection (his tailor is an artist in cut and fit) and apparently unstudied grace. It is borne upon one's conscientiousness that Mr. Koussevitzky could act the role of King Lear, Romeo, or a Harlequin. His is the personality to intrigue the emotionally minded in any kind of program. On this occasion he began with the Vivaldi Concerto and established the fact that the Bostonians do not believe it necessary to be meticulously exact in beginning or ending phrases. The performance sounded a bit ragged to us. It is all right for some of the modern, unmusical mix-ups, but not so good when it comes to the classics. The Debussy Nocturnes were played with great finesse, lovely quality of tone and evoked much applause, also the aforesaid sighs of contentment.

Stravinsky's "Petrouschka" was given about as well as we have ever heard it given; the conductor was in his element, for he could dance with them, and assume any one of the characters revealed in the various movements of this orchestral suite.

Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony was the summum bonum of the program; at times the Russian conductor crashed out thunderously and then suddenly dropped to the whisper of pines. All very effective, unusual, illuminating and dramatically exciting. Great is the power of personality and the management of George Brennan.

Program

Vivaldi..Concerto in D minor for Orchestra with Organ
Debussy..... Two Nocturnes
Stravinsky, Orchestral Suite from the Ballet, "Petrouschka."
Tschaikowsky, Symphony No. 6 in B minor, "Pathetic," Op. 74.

* * *

Sun-Tele. Nov. 3

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra

SYRIA MOSQUE

PROGRAM.

Handel, Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 10.
Strauss, Interlude from "Intermezzo"
Stravinsky, Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu" ("The Fire-Bird")
Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 6 in B minor, "Pathetic," Op. 74.

The matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Syria Mosque yesterday afternoon surpassed the program of the previous evening, no matter how strange it must be to credit such excellence. Serge Koussevitzky, more sure and more reposed than ever before, made music that was uncanny with new beauties, and we listened to Tschaikowsky as if for the first time.

The novelty of the program was a charming interlude from Richard Strauss's opera, "Intermezzo," a story of his own family life. It is frankly music for the heart, ignores all the modern "isms," and is unashamed to sing a very fine melody. It is more reminiscent of the music in Strauss's songs than in his operas. He obviously succeeded in breaking away from the ponderous scores in which he had been steeped during "Salome" and "Elektra" and created a score more entertaining than "Rosenkavalier."

The Boston string choir was again in evidence in the Handel concerto. Over the Stravinsky score Koussevitsky wove a tone of mystery and enchantment, such as we have never heard given this music. But Tschaikowsky's last symphony was the supreme achievment of the concert. Instead of the unrelenting lament which other conductors sing into our ears through this music, Koussevitsky's tone was balm. He did not divest the "Pathetique" of its tragedy, but he played a song of hope.

J. FRED LISSFELT.

Concert-Chronicle

Privately—from Chicago

THIS department has leave to quote a paragraph or two from a private letter about the visit, last week, to Chicago of Dr. Koussevitsky and the Boston Orchestra. The letter comes from a Chicagoan of large experience in opera-house and concert-hall:

I notice that one of the local critics in reviewing the concert of the Boston Symphony here last night spoke of the enthusiasm displayed by the large number of Koussevitzky's compatriots in the audience. Probably so, but I noticed that the persons seated about me—obviously American and excellent Chicagoans unhyphenated—wore their palms red applauding your superb band.

And why not? It was like a breeze of refreshing air on a hot day of summer to hear the Boston men. It was more than good, this vitality, aliveness, and stimulation; while if one is vexed at Koussevitzky for his "readings," no one unbiased can say he puts the auditors to sleep on the safe and sane assurance that bones will not be disturbed.

The evening was a growing triuumph. The applause after the Stravinsky number threatened to become an ovation of riotous measure, not due to a handful of Russians only. But the Chaikovsky "Pathetic" became an anti-climax. One regretted that Koussevitzky chose this; for in this day and age the thing is so overdone. Orchestral audiences in cities like this look for something else. He should have given Chicago one of his magnificent Strauss numbers and then there would have been no holding the natives.

Herald. Nov 4

FOUNDED 1900 BY CHARLES F. FRENCH

FLORENCE FRENCH
EDITOR AND PUBLISHER

MUSICAL LEADER

E. F. SMITH
J. DEMERATH
F. M. WARD

TELEPHONE { 4839 HARRISON { 5408
CABLE ADDRESS: MUSICLEAD CHICAGO

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

SUBSCRIPTION: $3.00 FOR YEAR
CANADIAN $4.00 FOR YEAR
FOREIGN $4.50 FOR YEAR

CHICAGO, 501 McCORMICK BUILDING 332 SO MICHIGAN AVE

NOV 11 1929

YOUR ATTENTION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH APPEARED IN LAST THURSDAY'S ISSUE OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

Showmanship-Plus

Boston Players and Mr. Koussevitzky Visit Chicago and Attract Large Audience to Orchestra Hall

"Ohs," "Ahs," and sighs of rapturous delight from weak women in the audience, and whole hearted approval from the men followed the performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky who was born in Tiev. He acquired a great reputation abroad as a double bass player, and ultimately obtained the position of conductor of the famous organization founded by Colonel Higginson in the "Hub" many years ago. The symphony players stopped in Chicago Tuesday of last week and gave this city a taste of their quality. Once in a while it is good to see what the other fellow is doing, and if he gives you a bit of thrill so much the better.

The Boston Symphony is Koussevitzky and when first entrusted with the directorship five years ago he must have been a revelation to New Englanders, accustomed as they were to the quiet leadership of the French conductor, Monteux. Koussevitzky is personity,—plus. One forgets the orchestra players in watching the conductor play with them and with his audience. He holds both forces in the hollow of the two hands he uses so expertly and so expressively. We were seated at just the right angle to follow his gestures, pantomime and extraordinary mobile countenance. One sensed his complete control of the situation. He is a polished actor of erect figure, cameo-like countenance, sartorial perfection (his tailor is an artist in cut and fit) and apparently unstudied grace. It is borne upon one's conscientiousness that Mr. Koussevitzky could act the role of King Lear, Romeo, or a Harlequin. His is the personality to intrigue the emotionally minded in any kind of program. On this occasion he began with the Vivaldi Concerto and established the fact that the Bostonians do not believe it necessary to be meticulously exact in beginning or ending phrases. The performance sounded a bit ragged to us. It is all right for some of the modern, unmusical mix-ups, but not so good when it comes to the classics. The Debussy Nocturnes were played with great finesse, lovely quality of tone and evoked much applause, also the aforesaid sighs of contentment.

Stravinsky's "Petrouschka" was given about as well as we have ever heard it given; the conductor was in his element, for he could dance with them, and assume any one of the characters revealed in the various movements of this orchestral suite.

Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony was the summum bonum of the program; at times the Russian conductor crashed out thunderously and then suddenly dropped to the whisper of pines. All very effective, unusual, illuminating and dramatically exciting. Great is the power of personality and the management of George Brennan.

Program

Vivaldi..Concerto in D minor for Orchestra with Organ
Debussy..... Two Nocturnes
Stravinsky, Orchestral Suite from the Ballet, "Petrouschka."
Tschaikowsky, Symphony No. 6 in B minor, "Pathetic," Op. 74.

* * *

FOUNDED 1900 BY CHARLES F. FRENCH

FRENCH
PUBLISHER

MUSICAL LEADER

{4839
N{5408
SICLEAD CHICAGO

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

CHICAGO NOV 4

JR ATTENTION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH A Y'S ISSUE OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

New Work Played by Boston Symphony

By MARTA S. MANNING

Boston, Oct. 26, 1929.

The Friday afternoon audience at Symphony Hall was delighted with Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor (for orchestra with organ), interested by Josten's Symphonic Poem "Jungle," which received its world premiere and all together absorbed by the "Pathetic" Symphony of Tschaikowsky, always a favorite.

There was the usual quiver of excitement and tenseness before Mr. Josten's new work. Interest was gained at once by the moving, primitive Voodoo rhythm with which it opens; it was held through the successive thematic developments to the final overwhelming lion's roar. A round of applause, more cordial than that accorded most "first times" in Boston, broke forth at the conclusion of the work and compelled Mr. Josten's appearance upon the stage beside Dr. Koussevitsky.

"Jungle" was inspired by a painting, "Forêt exotique," by the French artist Henri Rousseau. It was composed in 1928 and is written in Sonata-Allegro form with an extended coda. To quote Mr. Josten, his symphonic poem "tries to portray the emotions and sensations which assail a white man entering the jungle, with its lures, terrors, primitive love and ferocious death."

The Tschaikowsky symphony received a masterly interpretation at the hands of Dr. Koussevitsky. The second movement especially was so faultlessly and feelingly played that, at its conclusion, a spontaneous acknowledgement sounded out. Both conductor and men were as one, and all the delicate shadings of the work were brought out.

The next pair of concerts will be given at Symphony Hall, November 8 and 9, since the orchestra will be giving a series of concerts in the West during the week of November 4.

Sun-Tele. Nov. 3

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra

SYRIA MOSQUE

PROGRAM.

Handel, Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 10.
Strauss, Interlude from "Intermezzo"
Stravinsky, Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu" ("The Fire-Bird")
Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 6 in B minor, "Pathetic," Op. 74.

The matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Syria Mosque yesterday afternoon surpassed the program of the previous evening, no matter how strange it must be to credit such excellence. Serge Koussevitsky, more sure and more reposed than ever before, made music that was uncanny with new beauties, and we listened to Tschaikowsky as if for the first time.

The novelty of the program was a charming interlude from Richard Strauss's opera, "Intermezzo," a story of his own family life. It is frankly music for the heart, ignores all the modern "isms," and is unashamed to sing a very fine melody. It is more reminiscent of the music in Strauss's songs than in his operas. He obviously succeeded in breaking away from the ponderous scores in which he had been steeped during "Salome" and "Elektra" and created a score more entertaining than "Rosenkavalier."

The Boston string choir was again in evidence in the Handel concerto. Over the Stravinsky score Koussevitsky wove a tone of mystery and enchantment, such as we have never heard given this music. But Tschaikowsky's last symphony was the supreme achievment of the concert. Instead of the unrelenting lament which other conductors sing into our ears through this music, Koussevitsky's tone was balm. He did not divest the "Pathetique" of its tragedy, but he played a song of hope.

J. FRED LISSFELT.

145

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH
SEP 15 1929

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will appear here November 1 and 2 in the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association's series.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
SEP 15 1929

ARISES EARLY

Dog Is Noted Musician's Constant Companion.

Before the average business men have opened their eyes, Serge Koussevitzky, the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is taking his daily ante-breakfast stroll around Jamaica Pond in Boston, with his inseparable companion, "Drofi." "Droll" is a Boston terrier, adopted two years ago by Mr. and Mrs. Koussevitzky, and he accompanies them across the Atlantic to be near at hand during his master's spring seasons in Paris.

The daily routine of Koussevitzky during the concert season is rehearsal at Symphony Hall from 10 until 1. Following lunch, there is correspondence, score correction, program making. Then there are occasional interviews, visits, and some recreation. In the evening there is more music, so with concerts, their preparation, and his annual spring Paris series, there are few jobs which require more, or even as much, as the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Koussevitzky will open the symphony series here at Syria Mosque on Friday night and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 1 and 2, and the Koussevitzky programs are always awaited with the keenest interest. Other world-famous orchestras to be presented in this series under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Assn., include the Detroit, with Gabriowitsch conducting; the Cleveland, with Sokoloff conducting, and Josef Hofmann as piano soloist; the Chicago Orchestra, with Frederick Stock conducting, for two visits, and the Minneapolis Orchestra, with Verbrugghen conducting, and Yehudi Menuhin, the sensational 12-year-old violinist, as soloist. The dates for these concerts, for which subscriptions are now open are Nov. 1, 2 and 15, 16; Dec. 6, 7; Jan. 20; Feb. 14, 15, and March 31.

DANCER COMING HERE

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER
SEP 22 1929

Orchestra Series

This week the Buffalo Musical Foundation issues its fall announcements of the orchestra series of concerts, which brings to Elmwood Music Hall this winter, Koussevitzky with the Boston Symphony, Gabrilowitsch with the Detroit Symphony, Stock with the Chicago, Reiner with the Cincinnati Symphony and Sokoloff with the Cleveland, in a series of seven concerts.

This will be the last call for season subscribers for the 1929-30 orchestra concerts, and everyone interested in receiving it is asked to notify the Buffalo Musical Foundation office in Denton, Cottier & Daniels store.

Bringing to Buffalo about 450 of the finest players on various orchestral instruments, these symphony concerts not only present great conductors but offer much distinction in the ranks of the players. In the case of the Boston Symphony orchestra, this is especially true. Mention should be made of Franz Kneisel, for so many years concert-master, and Richard Burgin, the present holder of the post. At the first desk sits Julius Theodorowicz, in the place once held by Prof. Charles Martin Loeffler, the composer.

Jean Bedetti, principal violincellist,, Georges Laurent, first flutist, and moving spirit of the Boston Flute Players' Club, are distinguished holders of important posts. Ferdinand Gillet, worthy successor to the great Longy, a well-loved figure in the Boston Symphony; Jean LeFranc, principal of the viola section; Abdon Laus, bassoon player unsurpassed; Georges Hamelin, principal clarinetist; Louis Speyer, English horn soloist; Georges Mager, who accomplishes such miracles with modern trumpet solos; Georg Boettcher, principal of the incomparable horn choir; Albert Ritter, the timpanist, these are a few of the many who might be mentioned.

The last year has seen the passing of several veteran members in the Boston Symphony ranks, Richard Kurth for 42 years a member of the orchestra, and Alwin Schroeder, distinguished 'cellist, both of whom lived but a few years after their retirement from the symphony. Barth, 'cellist, is almost the last of the "old-timers," now that Holy, harpist, Hofmann, violinist, and Arthur Brooke, flutist, have retired.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

ORCHESTRAS COMING

Local Season to Open With the Boston Symphony.

Serge Koussevitzky, opens the orchestral season in Pittsburgh on Friday night and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 1 and 2, at Syria Mosque, with his Boston Symphony. During the summer Mr. Koussevitzky conferred with the foremost living composers, and brought back in his portfolio a suite from the new ballet of Prokofieff, "L'Enfant Prodigue," which he will give its first American performance. New American scores he will introduce are a symphony of Aaron Copland, and the latest work of Werner Josten. An interesting revival will be a Woodwind concerto of Spohr, lately recommended to Mr. Koussevitzky by Richard Strauss.

Other conductors who will come to Pittsburgh this season under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Assn. include Ossip Gabrilowitsch, in the dual role of conductor and piano soloist with the Detroit Orchestra; Nikolai Sokoloff, leader of the Cleveland Orchestra; Frederick Stock, conductor of the Chicago Orchestra, and Henri Verbrugghen, of the Minneapolis Orchestra. Soloists in addition to Gabrilowitsch, include Josef Hofmann and Yehudi Menuhin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
POST GAZETTE
OCT 19 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will open the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association concerts at Syria Mosque on Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 1 and 2. The program for Friday night will include Handel's Concerto Grosso for strings, Strauss' Intermezzo, Stravinsky's Fire Bird Suite and Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony. Saturday afternoon's program includes Vivaldi Concerto in D minor, Wagner's Prelude to Lohengrin, Scriabin's Poem of Ecstasy and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH
OCT 20 1929

Symphony Series Opens November 1

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitsky conducting, will open the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association series of concerts in Syria Mosque on Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 1 and 2.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH
POST-GAZETTE
OCT 26 1929

VISITING ORCHESTRAS

The season of visiting orchestra concerts will open next Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 1 and 2, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Syria Mosque. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has prepared two fine programs, the major works being Tschaikowsky's Symphony "Pathetic" and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5. Other works on the evening program are Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra, Strauss Interlude from Intermezzo and Stravinsky's Suite from "The Fire Bird." In addition to the Beethoven Symphony on the matinee program, are Vivaldi's Concerto in D Minor for orchestra, Wagner's Prelude to Lohengrin and Stravinsky's "Petrouchka Suite."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH
OCT 27 1929

LEADER

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Syria Mosque on Friday night and Saturday afternoon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH
OCT 27 1929

Boston Symphony In Two Concerts

FRIDAY night and Saturday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present a concert in Syria Mosque. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct. The major works to be offered are Tschaikowsky's Symphony "Pathetic" and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
OCT 27 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Opens Visiting Orchestra Season This Week.

Visiting orchestra concerts will open auspiciously next Friday night and Saturday afternoon, with the Boston Symphony at Sria Mosque. [redacted] Koussevitzky has prepared two unusually fine programs for his Pittsburgh visit, the major works being Tschaikowsky's symphony "Pathetic" (evening), and Beethoven's smphony No. 5 (afternoon).

Other works of importance on the evening program are Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra; Strauss Interlude from Intermezzo and Stravinsky's suite from "The Fire Bird."

In addition to the Beethoven symphony on the matinee program, there will be Vivaldi's Concerto in D Minor for orchestra, Wagner's Prelude to Lohengrin and Stravinsky's "Petrouchka Suite."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
OCT 31 1929

CONCERT PATRONS ARE NAMED

The annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra always attracts society en masse, and entertaining is general on this occasion. Among the boxholders for tomorrow night to welcome Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his virtuoso orchestra of 110 players are Mrs. William Thaw, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Ogden M. Edwards, Mrs. William Watson Smith, Dr. and Mrs. W. J. Holland, Mr. and Mrs. H. H. McClintic, Mrs. Enoch Rauh, Mrs. Horace Forbes Baker, Mrs. H. C. Cooper, Mrs. George E. Tener, Mrs. William M. McKelvy, Mrs. James Edward Lewis, Mrs. George A. Harwood, Mrs. Samuel McClay, Mrs. A. L. Humphrey, Mrs. H. K. Hitchcock, Mrs. Daniel M. Clemson, Mrs. George P. Bassett, Jr., Mrs. Nathaniel Spear, Mrs. Ralph Flinn, Mrs. Walter F. Schleiter, Mrs. John W. Lawrence, Mrs. L. Gerald Firth, Mrs. Mortimer Miller, Mrs. W. H. R. Hilliard, Mrs. Leon Falk, Jr., Mrs. Henry R. Rea, Mrs. Charles J. Ramsburg Mrs. W. W. Wattles, Mrs. R. S. Smith, Mrs. Robert S. McCague, Mrs. John H. Kerr, Mrs. Joseph A. Herron, Mrs. Henry Vaughan Blaxter and Mrs. Paul B. Straub.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH
OCT 31 1929

TOMORROW night will find many of our society folk at Syria Mosque for the annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And many social leaders will, as usual, entertain box parties, to hear Dr. Serge Koussevitsky's orchestra of 110 players.

Mrs. William Thaw, Jr., Dr. and Mrs. Ogden M. Edwards, Mrs. William Watson Smith, Dr. and Mrs. W. J. Holland, the H. H. McClintics will have box parties. I know

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH
OCT 31 1929

Boston Symphony Appears in Mosque

The Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to [redacted]burgh this week for two concerts and will be heard tomorrow night and Saturday afternoon at Syria Mosque. Serge Koussevitzky will lead the orchestra of 110 players in the presentation of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" symphony tomorrow night and in presenting Beethoven's symphony No. 5, Saturday afternoon.

145

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH
SEP 15

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will appear here November 1 and 2 in the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association's series.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
SEP 15

ARISES EARLY

Dog Is Noted Musician's Constant Companion.

Before the average business men have opened their eyes, Serge Koussevitzky, the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is taking his daily ante-breakfast stroll around Jamaica Pond in Boston, with his inseparable companion, "Droll." "Droll" is a Boston terrier, adopted two years ago by Mr. and Mrs. Koussevitzky, and he accompanies them across the Atlantic to be near at hand during his master's spring seasons in Paris.

The daily routine of Koussevitzky during the concert season is rehearsal at Symphony Hall from 10 until 1. Following lunch, there is correspondence, score correction, program making. Then there are occasional interviews, visits, and some recreation. In the evening there is more music, so with concerts, their preparation, and his annual spring Paris series, there are few jobs which require more, or even as much, as the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Koussevitzky will open the symphony series here at Syria Mosque on Friday night and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 1 and 2, and the Koussevitzky programs are always awaited with the keenest interest. Other world-famous orchestras to be presented in this series under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Assn., include the Detroit, with Gabriowitsch conducting; the Cleveland, with Sokoloff conducting, and Josef Hofmann as piano soloist; the Chicago Orchestra, with Frederick Stock conducting, for two visits, and the Minneapolis Orchestra, with Verbrugghen conducting, and Yehudi Menuhin, the sensational 12-year-old violinist, as soloist. The dates for these concerts, for which subscriptions are now open are Nov. 1, 2 and 15, 16; Dec. 6, 7; Jan. 20; Feb. 14, 15, and March 31.

DANCER COMING HERE

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER
SEP 22 1929

Orchestra Series

This week the Buffalo Musical Foundation issues its fall announcements of the orchestra series of concerts, which brings to Elmwood Music Hall this winter, Koussevitzky with the Boston Symphony, Gabrilowitsch with the Detroit Symphony, Stock with the Chicago, Reiner with the Cincinnati Symphony and Sokoloff with the Cleveland, in a series of seven concerts.

This will be the last call for season subscribers for the 1929-30 orchestra concerts, and everyone interested in receiving it is asked to notify the Buffalo Musical Foundation office in Denton, Cottier & Daniels store.

Bringing to Buffalo about 450 of the finest players on various orchestral instruments, these symphony concerts not only present great conductors but offer much distinction in the ranks of the players. In the case of the Boston Symphony orchestra, this is especially true. Mention should be made of Franz Kneisel, for so many years concert-master, and Richard Burgin, the present holder of the post. At the first desk sits Julius Theodorowicz, in the place once held by Prof. Charles Martin Loeffler, the composer.

Jean Bedetti, principal violincellist,, Georges Laurent, first flutist, and moving spirit of the Boston Flute Players' Club, are distinguished holders of important posts. Ferdinand Gillet, worthy successor to the great Longy, a well-loved figure in the Boston Symphony; Jean LeFranc, principal of the viola section; Abdon Laus, bassoon player unsurpassed; Georges Hamelin, principal clarinetist; Louis Speyer, English horn soloist; Georges Mager, who accomplishes such miracles with modern trumpet solos; Georg Boettcher, principal of the incomparable horn choir; Albert Ritter, the timpanist, these are a few of the many who might be mentioned.

The last year has seen the passing of several veteran members in the Boston Symphony ranks, Richard Kurth for 42 years a member of the orchestra, and Alwin Schroeder, distinguished 'cellist, both of whom lived but a few years after their retirement from the symphony. Barth, 'cellist, is almost the last of the "old-timers," now that Holy, harpist, Hofmann, violinist, and Arthur Brooke, flutist, have retired.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

ORCHESTRAS COMING

Local Season to Open With the Boston Symphony.

Serge Koussevitzky, opens the orchestral season in Pittsburgh on Friday night and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 1 and 2, at Syria Mosque, with his Boston Symphony. During the summer Mr. Koussevitzky conferred with the foremost living composers, and brought back in his portfolio a suite from the new ballet of Prokofieff, "L'Enfant Prodigue," which he will give its first American performance. New American scores he will introduce are a symphony of Aaron Copland, and the latest work of Werner Josten. An interesting revival will be a Woodwind concerto of Spohr, lately recommended to Mr. Koussevitzky by Richard Strauss.

Other conductors who will come to Pittsburgh this season under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Assn. include Ossip Gabrilowitsch, in the dual role of conductor and piano soloist with the Detroit Orchestra; Nikolai Sokoloff, leader of the Cleveland Orchestra; Frederick Stock, conductor of the Chicago Orchestra, and Henri Verbrugghen, of the Minneapolis Orchestra. Soloists in addition to Gabrilowitsch, include Josef Hofmann and Yehudi Menuhin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
POST GAZETTE
OCT 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will open the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association concerts at Syria Mosque on Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 1 and 2. The program for Friday night will include Handel's Concerto Grosso for strings, Strauss' Intermezzo, Stravinsky's Fire Bird Suite and Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony. Saturday afternoon's program includes Vivaldi Concerto in D minor, Wagner's Prelude to Lohengrin, Scriabin's Poem of Ecstasy and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH
OCT 20 1929

Symphony Series Opens November 1

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitsky conducting, will open the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association series of concerts in Syria Mosque on Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 1 and 2.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH
POST-GAZETTE
OCT 20

VISITING ORCHESTRAS

The season of visiting orchestra concerts will open next Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 1 and 2, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Syria Mosque. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has prepared two fine programs, the major works being Tschaikowsky's Symphony "Pathetic" and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5. Other works on the evening program are Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra, Strauss Interlude from Intermezzo and Stravinsky's Suite from "The Fire Bird." In addition to the Beethoven Symphony on the matinee program, are Vivaldi's Concerto in D Minor for orchestra, Wagner's Prelude to Lohengrin and Stravinsky's "Petrouchka Suite."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH

LEADER

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Syria Mosque on Friday night and Saturday afternoon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH

Boston Symphony In Two Concerts

FRIDAY night and Saturday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present a concert in Syria Mosque. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct. The major works to be offered are Tschaikowsky's Symphony "Pathetic" and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
OCT 7

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Opens Visiting Orchestra Season This Week.

Visiting orchestra concerts will open auspiciously next Friday night and Saturday afternoon, with the Boston Symphony at Sria Mosque. [redacted] Koussevitzky has prepared two unusually fine programs for his Pittsburgh visit, the major works being Tschaikowsky's symphony "Pathetic" (evening), and Beethoven's smphony No. 5 (afternoon).

Other works of importance on the evening program are Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra; Strauss Interlude from Intermezzo and Stravinsky's suite from "The Fire Bird."

In addition to the Beethoven symphony on the matinee program, there will be Vivaldi's Concerto in D Minor for orchestra, Wagner's Prelude to Lohengrin and Stravinsky's "Petrouchka Suite."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
OCT 31

CONCERT PATRONS ARE NAMED

The annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra always attracts society en masse, and entertaining is general on this occasion. Among the boxholders for tomorrow night to welcome Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his virtuoso orchestra of 110 players are Mrs. William Thaw, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Ogden M. Edwards, Mrs. William Watson Smith, Dr. and Mrs. W. J. Holland, Mr. and Mrs. H. H. McClintic, Mrs. Enoch Rauh, Mrs. Horace Forbes Baker, Mrs. H. C. Cooper, Mrs. George E. Tener, Mrs. William M. McKelvy, Mrs. James Edward Lewis, Mrs. George A. Harwood, Mrs. Samuel McClay, Mrs. A. L. Humphrey, Mrs. H. K. Hitchcock, Mrs. Daniel M. Clemson, Mrs. George P. Bassett, Jr., Mrs. Nathaniel Spear, Mrs. Ralph Flinn, Mrs. Walter F. Schleiter, Mrs. John W. Lawrence, Mrs. L. Gerald Firth, Mrs. Mortimer Miller, Mrs. W. H. R. Hilliard, Mrs. Leon Falk, Jr., Mrs. Henry R. Rea, Mrs. Charles J. Ramsburg Mrs. W. W. Wattles, Mrs. R. S. Smith, Mrs. Robert S. McCague, Mrs. John H. Kerr, Mrs. Joseph A. Herron, Mrs. Henry Vaughan Blaxter and Mrs. Paul B. Straub.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH
OCT 31

TOMORROW night will find many of our society folk at Syria Mosque for the annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And many social leaders will, as usual, entertain box parties, to hear Dr. Serge Koussevitsky's orchestra of 110 players.

Mrs. William Thaw, Jr., Dr. and Mrs. Ogden M. Edwards, Mrs. William Watson Smith, Dr. and Mrs. W. J. Holland, the H. H. McClintics will have box parties. I know

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH
OCT 31

Boston Symphony Appears in Mosque

The Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to Pittsburgh this week for two concerts and will be heard tomorrow night and Saturday afternoon at Syria Mosque. Serge Koussevitzky will lead the orchestra of 110 players in the presentation of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" symphony tomorrow night and in presenting Beethoven's symphony No. 5, Saturday afternoon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
NOV 2 - 1929

146

Society Attends Symphony Concert

Fashionable Assemblage Congregates In Syria Mosque To Welcome Boston Symphony; Dinners Precede Program.

GLANCING over a symphony audience, after a particularly brilliant interpretation of a musical composition, one is pleasantly reassured that Americans are not in any immediate danger of losing their musical appreciation. It was an artistic as well as fashionable assemblage that crowded Syria Mosque last night to welcome Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Countless motor cars drew up before the Mosque long before the program was scheduled to begin, groups congregated in the foyer and inside the concert hall chatting with friends. It was a scene similar to opera night and elaborately gowned women and men in evening dress contributed a colorful atmospheric note.

Many men and women prominent in public life were present as well as several groups of the younger social set.

A number of dinner parties preceded the concert.

Previous to the playing of Beethoven's "Symphony 5 in C Minor" an intermission was held. Mrs. John Freeman was seen in conversation with Mrs. S. G. Cooper, the latter in a gown of fine black lace. Guests in the same box were Mrs. James Todd of Sewickley in a gown of the fashionable black crepe and Mrs. Tracey Guthrie in white crepe with floral border design.

ELABORATE GOWNS.

Mrs. Daniel M. Clemson in a gown of colorfully patterned metallic cloth was entertaining Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Harden Church, the latter in a gown of burgundy lace and Mr. and Mrs. William Maclay Hall. Mrs. Hall's gown was an attractive model of eggshell tulle with metallic motif. Howard Irish was also seen in the Clemson box. Visiting there for a brief chat was Mrs. George Bassett, who wore a gown of darkest blue crepe. In the latter's party at a neighboring box was Mrs. William Thaw in a transparent wrap of vivid violet shade and Miss Dohrman in an ensemble of black gown and wrap. Miss Anne Griffith, with them was wearing a gown of flesh chiffon crystal beaded top and skirt of black with similar motif of clusters of beads. In a box to the right of the auditorium was seen Mrs. W. H. Hillard in a wisteria hued gown with rhinestone trimming, Mrs. William L. Mellon in a metallic gown of delicate floral pattern, Mrs. Mortimer Miller in eggshell satin and Mrs. William Terrell Johnson in a gown of what chiffon combined with delicate black lace.

Rosamond Fitch, a debutante of this season, was seen chatting with a party composed of Mr. and Mrs. John Gardner Woods, the latter in a gown of apple green satin, Charles Woods, Miss Eleanor George, also in green satin and Morrison Fitch. Miss Fitch wore a frock of chiffon with painted flower motif.

Mrs. George McCook, seen in the hall, was wearing a gown of black net and Mrs. I. D. Wolf in another group wore a black velvet wrap over a gown of dark beige fish net.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
NOV 3

KOUSSEVITZSKY C

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZSKY, conductor, who once played th like a New York banker tha some liberty with Vivaldi's concerto Symphony Orchestra at Syria Mosq This concerto was written for o sevitzsky didn't use the organ.

Of course, he had a perfect alibi And it may seem entirely out of of the Mosque should undertake to i possesses in our incomparable Carn organs in the United States, preside acknowledged master.

Saill, the greater size of the Mc majority of the other big concerts th an organ is a kind of anomaly, believe

PITTSBURGH SUN-TELEGRAPH
SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 2, 1929

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra

SYRIA MOSQUE

PROGRAM.

Vivaldi, Concert in D minor for Orchestra (Edited by A. Siloti)
1. Maestoso
2. Largo
3. Allegro

Wagner ..... Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Stravinsky, Orchestral suite from the Ballet, "Petrouchka"
Beethoven, symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, played the opening concert of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association in Syria Mosque last night. It was gratifying to note the increased attendance and the fine applause for these players, and may we hope for continued appreciation of these unsurpassed concerts.

The Boston Orchestra has always meant superlative musicianship. The concert last night was no exception, no matter how much any of us prefer other interpretations. Koussevitzky is a leader with aristocratic demeanor. His active interest finds new music, but he prefers to play his music with academic aloofness rather than personal abandon. Therefore his orchestra's tone is purged of imperfections, and only when a Stravinsky flings his color pot into the midst of this orchestra do we find its heart.

One missed the usual novelty which Koussevitzky always brings us, for the "Petrouchka Suite" now belongs to an older generation of modern music. Just in this music was the orchestra most interesting, for it resisted the many temptations of pure showmanship, and yet gave us brilliant though not garish color. It was interesting to contrast the classic and romantic in the opening numbers of Vivaldi and Wagner. The first was so clearly sung, that if one had been quick-witted enough and so minded, one might have written out every phrase of the score. The Wagner prelude came with more restraint, but that marvelously emphasized the beautiful mystery of the "Lohengrin" legend, especially during the one climax in the brasses.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony certainly has never had a more suave reading. Where Toscanini enlivens his Beethoven so that every phrase dances in Italian sunlight, Koussevitzky has gone to the other extreme. Beethoveen was here in kid gloves. He was Bostonian. Not the Beethoven who shook his shaggy mane in the storm. Beethoven would certainly have admired the andante, but he might also have stamped his foot impatiently during the first and especially the third movements. The life was polished out of them.

J. FRED LISSFELT.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
NOV 2

Boston Symphony Opens Season

Brilliant Audience at Mosque for Inaugural Concert—Koussevitzky Leads His Men Through Fine Program, Although "Polichinello" Eludes Our Vigilance—Beethoven's Fifth Given Majestic Reading.

By WILLIAM R. MITCHEL,
Press Music Critic.

WHEN Dr. Serge Koussevitzky—conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra which opened the fourteenth season of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Assn. — stepped upon the podium at Syria Mosque, last night, we all felt something better than usual was in store for us; for Serge looked mighty well pleased, confident that his 110 men were in the pink of condition.

Nor were we disappointed. The orchestra played as well as the conductor knew it would. That was no small audience either, for all the choice seats seemed to be pretty well filled, although there was a vacant chair to be observed here and there.

* * *

OF THE offerings on the program we liked best of all, perhaps, the Stravinsky suite from the ballet, "Petrouchka" who is revealed in the program annotations as a sort of "Polichinello," always in trouble, seemingly.

Stravinsky made it up of a Russion dance, "Petrouchka," himself, a grand carnival, a dance of nurses, a bear and a peasant playing the hand-organ, the merchant and the gypsies, the dance of the coachman and the grooms and, at the end, the masqueraders.

TRY AS we would, though, it was a mighty ticklish task to "follow through," where one led into the next. We fondly imagined we had it now, but the next moment it had escaped us, altogether.

Then, when there came a brief pause—between the "Petrouchka" and the "Grand Carnival" (or was it between the grand carnival and the nurses' dance?)—we were fearful the piano player—who was to double on the harp in the very next number—would not make it in time, as he hurried across that vast stage from one instrument to the other. But he did, thank goodness, and we breathed easier, once more.

* * *

ALWAYS one can count on Stravinsky to say something different, in a different manner, In last night's "something," one found plenty of brilliancy, as in the audience, and plenty of variety during those 17 minutes from 9:03 to 9:20. But even if we could not "follow through" it was all such good fun—what with the audience and members of the orchestra understanding each other thoroughly—that it was rather enjoyable.

Vivaldi's concerto in D minor, with its three contrasting movements, was the opening number. Some strenuous work was accomplished by the strings in the first and last movements—the "Maestoso" and the "Allegro"—reminding of Handel in his palmy days now and then.

* * *

BUT THAT lovely "Largo"—which came between the other two like a calm upon a tempestous sea—was played with exquisite tenderness, dying away to a faint whisper toward the end, until there really lived nothing "twixt it and silence." In the prelude to "Lohengrin" the strings attained some ethereal effects, especially in the upper reaches.

Beethoven's fifth symphony, the C minor—which brought the well-balanced program to a fitting close—was given an authorative reading, Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation being very different from that of contemporaries.

* * *

THOSE grotesque, fugue-like passages in the third movement were played with a cumbersome effect, while that song of triumph in the finale afforded the brass choir an opportunity to reveal its adequacy.

Koussevitzky is one of the most picturesque conductors on the boards these days, and seldom makes an unnecessary move. The effects he obtains certainly justify the reputation with which he has been acclaimed.

Tschaikowsky, Stravinsky, Strauss and Handel are represented on this afternoon's program at the mosque.

From Harvey Gaul Page
PITTSBURGH POST-G

Yesterday afternoon's affair was rather informal, although the program arranged by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky—that thrilling director who never makes a false move—was one of the best we have heard at a soiree of this sort.

Handel's concerto for strings (opus 6, No. 10), was made up of the usual overture leading into the allegro, an air, the lento, the allegro moderato and the finale. Without a doubt it far surpassed—in our humble opinion—the Vivaldi concerto played the evening before at the inaugural concert of the orchestra association's fourteenth season—with a particularly lovely slow movement.

* * *

We heard, also, a Strauss interlude, Stravinsky's suite from "The Fire Bird," with its five contrasting movements, and Tschaikowsky's B minor symphony No. 6, the "Pathetic." There is some particularly enchanting solo work for the clarinet in that five-four waltz rhythm of the allegro congrazia—like that "two legs sat upon three legs" jingle—and those stinging pizzicatti scale passages for the strings were tensely effective.

* * *

But it is in the last movement you will find the Russian at his best: not, as some commentators seem to think, all noise and confusion, as in a "Tschilds" or a "Tschompson" restaurant with its clatter of "tschina."

Dr. Koussevitzky is one of the most picturesque figures on the podium these days, and the effects he produces with his excellent body of musicians certainly have not been surpassed by other visiting orchestras—in recent years, at least.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
NOV 1

Boston Symphony Here.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived in the city today for the annual concerts in Syria Mosque tonight and tomorrow afternoon. The major work tonight will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH
POST-GAZETTE
NOV 1

Society Takes Boxes For Annual Concert Of Boston Symphony

A notable assemblage of society will be seen tonight in the Syria Mosque at the annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Numerous box parties have been planned to hear Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his orchestra, which comprises 110 players.

Mrs. William Thaw, Jr., Mrs. William Watson Smith, Dr. and Mrs. W. J. Holland and Mr. and Mrs. H. H. McClintic will have box parties. Among other box patrons will be Dr. and Mrs. Ogden M. Edwards, Mrs. Enoch Rauh, Mrs. Horrace Forbes Baker, Mrs. H. C. Cooper, Mrs. George E. Tener, Mrs. William M. McKelvey, Mrs. James Edward Lewis, Mrs. George A. Harwood, Mrs. Samuel McClay, Mrs. A. L. Humphrey.

Mrs. H. K. Hitchcock, Mrs. Daniel M. Clemson, Mrs. George P. Bassett, Jr., Mrs. Nathaniel Spear, Mrs. Ralph Flinn, Mrs. Walter F. Schleiter, Mrs. John W. Lawrence, Mrs. L. Gerald Firth, Mrs. Mortimer Miller, Mrs. W. H. R. Hilliard.

Mrs. Leon Falk, Jr., Mrs. Henry R. Rea, Mrs. Charles J. Ramsburg, Mrs. W. W. Wattles, Mrs. R. S. Smith, Mrs. Robert S. McCague, Mrs. John H. Kerr, Mrs. Joseph A. Herron, Mrs. Henry Vaughan Blaxter and Mrs. Paul B. Straub.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
NOV 2

146

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
NOV 1 - [illegible]

Boston Symphony Here.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived in the city today for the annual concerts in Syria Mosque tonight and tomorrow afternoon. The major work tonight will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH
POST-GAZETTE
NOV 1 - 1929

Society Takes Boxes For Annual Concert Of Boston Symphony

A notable assemblage of society will be seen tonight in the Syria Mosque at the annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Numerous box parties have been planned to hear Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his orchestra, which comprises 110 players.

Mrs. William Thaw, Jr., Mrs. William Watson Smith, Dr. and Mrs. W. J. Holland and Mr. and Mrs. H. H. McClintic will have box parties. Among other box patrons will be Dr. and Mrs. Ogden M. Edwards, Mrs. Enoch Rauh, Mrs. Horrace Forbes Baker, Mrs. H. C. Cooper, Mrs. George E. Tener, Mrs. William M. McKelvey, Mrs. James Edward Lewis, Mrs. George A. Harwood, Mrs. Samuel McClay, Mrs. A. L. Humphrey.

Mrs. H. K. Hitchcock, Mrs. Daniel M. Clemson, Mrs. George P. Bassett, Jr., Mrs. Nathaniel Spear, Mrs. Ralph Flinn, Mrs. Walter F. Schleiter, Mrs. John W. Lawrence, Mrs. L. Gerald Firth, Mrs. Mortimer Miller, Mrs. W. H. R. Hilliard.

Mrs. Leon Falk, Jr., Mrs. Henry R. Rea, Mrs. Charles J. Ramsburg, Mrs. W. W. Wattles, Mrs. R. S. Smith, Mrs. Robert S. McCague, Mrs. John H. Kerr, Mrs. Joseph A. Herron, Mrs. Henry Vaughan Blaxter and Mrs. Paul B. Straub.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
NOV 2 - 1929

Society Attends Symphony Concert

Fashionable Assemblage Congregates In Syria Mosque To Welcome Boston Symphony; Dinners Precede Program.

GLANCING over a symphony audience, after a particularly brilliant interpretation of a musical composition, one is pleasantly reassured that Americans are not in any immediate danger of losing their musical appreciation. It was an artistic as well as fashionable assemblage that crowded Syria Mosque last night to welcome Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Countless motor cars drew up before the Mosque long before the program was scheduled to begin, groups congregated in the foyer and inside the concert hall chatting with friends. It was a scene similar to opera night and elaborately gowned women and men in evening dress contributed a colorful atmospheric note.

Many men and women prominent in public life were present as well as several groups of the younger social set.

A number of dinner parties preceded the concert.

Previous to the playing of Beethoven's "Symphony 5 in C Minor" an intermission was held. Mrs. John Freeman was seen in conversation with Mrs. S. G. Cooper, the latter in a gown of fine black lace. Guests in the same box were Mrs. James Todd of Sewickley in a gown of the fashionable black crepe and Mrs. Tracey Guthrie in white crepe with floral border design.

ELABORATE GOWNS.

Mrs. Daniel M. Clemson in a gown of colorfully patterned metallic cloth was entertaining Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Harden Church, the latter in a gown of burgundy lace and Mr. and Mrs. William Maclay Hall. Mrs. Hall's gown was an attractive model of eggshell tulle with metallic motif. Howard Irish was also seen in the Clemson box. Visiting there for a brief chat was Mrs. George Bassett, who wore a gown of darkest blue crepe. In the latter's party at a neighboring box was Mrs. William Thaw in a transparent wrap of vivid violet shade and Miss Dohrman in an ensemble of black gown and wrap. Miss Anne Griffith, with them was wearing a gown of flesh chiffon crystal beaded top and skirt of black with similar motif of clusters of beads. In a box to the right of the auditorium was seen Mrs. W. H. Hillard in a wisteria hued gown with rhinestone trimming, Mrs. William L. Mellon in a metallic gown of delicate floral pattern, Mrs. Mortimer Miller in eggshell satin and Mrs. William Terrell Johnson in a gown of what chiffon combined with delicate black lace.

Rosamond Fitch, a debutante of this season, was seen chatting with a party composed of Mr. and Mrs. John Gardner Woods, the latter in a gown of apple green satin, Charles Woods, Miss Eleanor George, also in green satin and Morrison Fitch. Miss Fitch wore a frock of chiffon with painted flower motif.

Mrs. George McCook, seen in the hall, was wearing a gown of black net and Mrs. I. D. Wolf in another group wore a black velvet wrap over a gown of dark beige fish net.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
NOV 3 - 1929

KOUSSEVITZSKY C

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZSKY, conductor, who once played th like a New York banker tha some liberty with Vivaldi's concerto Symphony Orchestra at Syria Mosq The concerto was written for sevitzsky didn't use the organ.

Of course, he had a perfect alibi—

And it may seem entirely out of of the Mosque should undertake to i possesses in our incomparable Carn organs in the United States, preside acknowledged master.

Saill, the greater size of the Mc majority of the other big concerts th an organ is a kind of anomaly, believe

PITTSBURGH SUN-TELEGRAPH
SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 2, 1929

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra

SYRIA MOSQUE

PROGRAM.
Vivaldi, Concert in D minor for Orchestra (Edited by A. Siloti)
1. Maestoso
2. Largo
3. Allegro
Wagner ..... Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Stravinsky, Orchestral suite from the Ballet, "Petrouchka"
Beethoven, symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, played the opening concert of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association in Syria Mosque last night. It was gratifying to note the increased attendance and the fine applause for these players, and may we hope for continued appreciation of these unsurpassed concerts.

The Boston Orchestra has always meant superlative musicianship. The concert last night was no exception, no matter how much any of us prefer other interpretations. Koussevitzky is a leader with aristocratic demeanor. His active interest finds new music, but he prefers to play his music with academic aloofness rather than personal abandon. Therefore his orchestra's tone is purged of imperfections, and only when a Stravinsky flings his color pot into the midst of this orchestra do we find its heart.

One missed the usual novelty which Koussevitzky always brings us, for the "Petrouchka Suite" now belongs to an older generation of modern music. Just in this music was the orchestra most interesting, for it resisted the many temptations of pure showmanship, and yet gave us brilliant though not garish color. It was interesting to contrast the classic and romantic in the opening numbers of Vivaldi and Wagner. The first was so clearly sung, that if one had been quick-witted enough and so minded, one might have written out every phrase of the score. The Wagner prelude came with more restraint, but that marvelously emphasized the beautiful mystery of the "Lohengrin" legend, especially during the one climax in the brasses.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony certainly has never had a more suave reading. Where Toscanini enlivens his Beethoven so that every phrase dances in Italian sunlight, Koussevitzky has gone to the other extreme. Beethoveen was here in kid gloves. He was Bostonian. Not the Beethoven who shook his shaggy mane in the storm. Beethoven would certainly have admired the andante, but he might also have stamped his foot impatiently during the first and especially the third movements. The life was polished out of them.

J. FRED LISSFELT.

Boston Symphony Opens Season

Brilliant Audience at Mosque for Inaugural Concert—Koussevitzky Leads His Men Through Fine Program, Although "Polichinello" Eludes Our Vigilance—Beethoven's Fifth Given Majestic Reading.

By WILLIAM R. MITCHEL,
Press Music Critic.

WHEN Dr. Serge Koussevitzky—conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra which opened the fourteenth season of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Assn. — stepped upon the podium at Syria Mosque, last night, we all felt something better than usual was in store for us; for Serge looked mighty well pleased, confident that his 110 men were in the pink of condition.

Nor were we disappointed. The orchestra played as well as the conductor knew it would. That was no small audience either, for all the choice seats seemed to be pretty well filled, although there was a vacant chair to be observed here and there.

* * *

OF THE offerings on the program we liked best of all, perhaps, the Stravinsky suite from the ballet, "Petrouchka" who is revealed in the program annotations as a sort of "Polichinello," always in trouble, seemingly.

Stravinsky made it up of a Russion dance, "Petrouchka," himself, a grand carnival, a dance of nurses, a bear and a peasant playing the hand-organ, the merchant and the gypsies, the dance of the coachman and the grooms and, at the end, the masqueraders.

TRY AS we would, though, it was a mighty ticklish task to "follow through," where one led into the next. We fondly imagined we had it now, but the next moment it had escaped us, altogether.

Then, when there came a brief pause—between the "Petrouchka" and the "Grand Carnival" (or was it between the grand carnival and the nurses' dance?)—we were fearful the piano player—who was to double on the harp in the very next number—would not make it in time, as he hurried across that vast stage from one instrument to the other. But he did, thank goodness, and we breathed easier, once more.

* * *

ALWAYS one can count on Stravinsky to say something different, in a different manner, In last night's "something," one found plenty of brilliancy, as in the audience, and plenty of variety during those 17 minutes from 9:03 to 9:20. But even if we could not "follow through" it was all such good fun—what with the audience and members of the orchestra understanding each other thoroughly—that it was rather enjoyable.

Vivaldi's concerto in D minor, with its three contrasting movements, was the opening number. Some strenuous work was accomplished by the strings in the first and last movements—the "Maestoso" and the "Allegro"—reminding of Handel in his palmy days now and then.

* * *

BUT THAT lovely "Largo"—which came between the other two like a calm upon a tempestous sea—was played with exquisite tenderness, dying away to a faint whisper toward the end, until there really lived nothing "twixt it and silence." In the prelude to "Lohengrin" the strings attained some ethereal effects, especially in the upper reaches.

Beethoven's fifth symphony, the C minor—which brought the well-balanced program to a fitting close—was given an authorative reading, Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation being very different from that of contemporaries.

* * *

THOSE grotesque, fugue-like passages in the third movement were played with a cumbersome effect, while that song of triumph in the finale afforded the brass choir an opportunity to reveal its adequacy.

Koussevitzky is one of the most picturesque conductors on the boards these days, and seldom makes an unnecessary move. The effects he obtains certainly justify the reputation with which he has been acclaimed.

Tschaikowsky, Stravinsky, Strauss and Handel are represented on this afternoon's program at the mosque.

From Harvey Gaul Page
PITTSBURGH POST-G

Yesterday afternoon's affair was rather informal, although the program arranged by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky—that thrilling director who never makes a false move—was one of the best we have heard at a soiree of this sort.

Handel's concerto for strings (opus 6, No. 10), was made up of the usual overture leading into the allegro, an air, the lento, the allegro moderato and the finale. Without a doubt it far surpassed—in our humble opinion—the Vivaldi concerto played the evening before at the inaugural concert of the orchestra association's fourteenth season—with a particularly lovely slow movement.

* * *

We heard, also, a Strauss interlude, Stravinsky's suite from "The Fire Bird," with its five contrasting movements, and Tschaikowsky's B minor symphony No. 6, the "Pathetic." There is some particularly enchanting solo work for the clarinet in that five-four waltz rhythm of the allegro congrazia—like that "two legs sat upon three legs" jingle—and those stinging pizzicatti scale passages for the strings were tensely effective.

* * *

But it is in the last movement you will find the Russian at his best: not, as some commentators seem to think, all noise and confusion; as in a "Tschilds" or a "Tschompson" restaurant with its clatter of "tschina."

Dr. Koussevitzky is one of the most picturesque figures on the podium these days, and the effects he produces with his excellent body of musicians certainly have not been surpassed by other visiting orchestras—in recent years, at least.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
NOV 1 - 1929

Boston Symphony Here.

Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived in the city today for the annual concerts in Syria Mosque tonight and tomorrow afternoon. The major work tonight will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH
POST-GAZETTE
NOV 1 - 1929

Society Takes Boxes For Annual Concert Of Boston Symphony

A notable assemblage of society will be seen tonight in the Syria Mosque at the annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Numerous box parties have been planned to hear Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his orchestra, which comprises 110 players.

Mrs. William Thaw, Jr., Mrs. William Watson Smith, Dr. and Mrs. W. J. Holland and Mr. and Mrs. H. H. McClintic will have box parties. Among other box patrons will be Dr. and Mrs. Ogden M. Edwards, Mrs. Enoch Rauh, Mrs. Horrace Forbes Baker, Mrs. H. C. Cooper, Mrs. George E. Tener, Mrs. William M. McKelvey, Mrs. James Edward Lewis, Mrs. George A. Harwood, Mrs. Samuel McClay, Mrs. A. L. Humphrey.

Mrs. H. K. Hitchcock, Mrs. Daniel M. Clemson, Mrs. George P. Bassett, Jr., Mrs. Nathaniel Spear, Mrs. Ralph Flinn, Mrs. Walter F. Schleiter, Mrs. John W. Lawrence, Mrs. L. Gerald Firth, Mrs. Mortimer Miller, Mrs. W. H. R. Hilliard.

Mrs. Leon Falk, Jr., Mrs. Henry R. Rea, Mrs. Charles J. Ramsburg, Mrs. W. W. Wattles, Mrs. R. S. Smith, Mrs. Robert S. McCague, Mrs. John H. Kerr, Mrs. Joseph A. Herron, Mrs. Henry Vaughan Blaxter and Mrs. Paul B. Straub.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
NOV 2 - 1929

Society Attends Symphony Concert

Fashionable Assemblage Congregates In Syria Mosque To Welcome Boston Symphony; Dinners Precede Program.

GLANCING over a symphony audience, after a particularly brilliant interpretation of a musical composition, one is pleasantly reassured that Americans are not in any immediate danger of losing their musical appreciation. It was an artistic as well as fashionable assemblage that crowded Syria Mosque last night to welcome Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Countless motor cars drew up before the Mosque long before the program was scheduled to begin, groups congregated in the foyer and inside the concert hall chatting with friends. It was a scene similar to opera night and elaborately gowned women and men in evening dress contributed a colorful atmospheric note.

Many men and women prominent in public life were present as well as several groups of the younger social set.

A number of dinner parties preceded the concert.

Previous to the playing of Beethoven's "Symphony 5 in C Minor" an intermission was held. Mrs. John Freeman was seen in conversation with Mrs. S. G. Cooper, the latter in a gown of fine black lace. Guests in the same box were Mrs. James Todd of Sewickley in a gown of the fashionable black crepe and Mrs. Tracey Guthrie in white crepe with floral border design.

ELABORATE GOWNS.

Mrs. Daniel M. Clemson in a gown of colorfully patterned metallic cloth was entertaining Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Harden Church, the latter in a gown of burgundy lace and Mr. and Mrs. William Maclay Hall. Mrs. Hall's gown was an attractive model of eggshell tulle with metallic motif. Howard Irish was also seen in the Clemson box. Visiting there for a brief chat was Mrs. George Bassett, who wore a gown of darkest blue crepe. In the latter's party at a neighboring box was Mrs. William Thaw in a transparent wrap of vivid violet shade and Miss Dohrman in an ensemble of black gown and wrap. Miss Anne Griffith, with them was wearing a gown of flesh chiffon crystal beaded top and skirt of black with similar motif of clusters of beads. In a box to the right of the auditorium was seen Mrs. W. H. Hillard in a wisteria hued gown with rhinestone trimming, Mrs. William L. Mellon in a metallic gown of delicate floral pattern, Mrs. Mortimer Miller in eggshell satin and Mrs. William Terrell Johnson in a gown of what chiffon combined with delicate black lace.

Rosamond Fitch, a debutante of this season, was seen chatting with a party composed of Mr. and Mrs. John Gardner Woods, the latter in a gown of apple green satin, Charles Woods, Miss Eleanor George, also in green satin and Morrison Fitch. Miss Fitch wore a frock of chiffon with painted flower motif.

Mrs. George McCook, seen in the hall, was wearing a gown of black net and Mrs. I. D. Wolf in another group wore a black velvet wrap over a gown of dark beige fish net.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
NOV 3 - 1929

KOUSSEVITZSKY CUTS THE ORGAN.

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZSKY, the brilliant and dynamic orchestra conductor, who once played the big bass viol and who looks more like a New York banker than like an orchestra conductor, took some liberty with Vivaldi's concerto in D minor in directing his Boston Symphony Orchestra at Syria Mosque on Friday evening.

The concerto was written for orchestra and organ, and Dr. Koussevitzsky didn't use the organ.

Of course, he had a perfect alibi—the Mosque dosn't have an organ.

And it may seem entirely out of order to suggest that the authorities of the Mosque should undertake to instal an organ, as long as Pittsburgh possesses in our incomparable Carnegie Music Hall, one of the finest organs in the United States, presided over by Dr. Charles Heinroth, an acknowledged master.

Saill, the greater size of the Mosque takes all the orchestras and a majority of the other big concerts there, and a great concert hall without an organ is a kind of anomaly, believe it or not.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
NOV 2 - 1929

Boston Symphony Opens Season

Brilliant Audience at Mosque for Inaugural Concert—Koussevitzky Leads His Men Through Fine Program, Although "Polichinello" Eludes Our Vigilance—Beethoven's Fifth Given Majestic Reading.

By WILLIAM R. MITCHEL,
Press Music Critic.

WHEN Dr. Serge Koussevitzky—conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra which opened the fourteenth season of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Assn. — stepped upon the podium at Syria Mosque, last night, we all felt something better than usual was in store for us; for Serge looked mighty well pleased, confident that his 110 men were in the pink of condition.

Nor were we disappointed. The orchestra played as well as the conductor knew it would. That was no small audience either, for all the choice seats seemed to be pretty well filled, although there was a vacant chair to be observed here and there.

* * *

OF THE offerings on the program we liked best of all, perhaps, the Stravinsky suite from the ballet, "Petrouchka" who is revealed in the program annotations as a sort of "Polichinello," always in trouble, seemingly.

Stravinsky made it up of a Russion dance, "Petrouchka," himself, a grand carnival, a dance of nurses, a bear and a peasant playing the hand-organ, the merchant and the gypsies, the dance of the coachman and the grooms and, at the end, the masqueraders.

TRY AS we would, though, it was a mighty ticklish task to "follow through," where one led into the next. We fondly imagined we had it now, but the next moment it had escaped us, altogether.

Then, when there came a brief pause—between the "Petrouchka" and the "Grand Carnival" (or was it between the grand carnival and the nurses' dance?)—we were fearful the piano player—who was to double on the harp in the very next number—would not make it in time, as he hurried across that vast stage from one instrument to the other. But he did, thank goodness, and we breathed easier, once more.

* * *

ALWAYS one can count on Stravinsky to say something different, in a different manner, In last night's "something," one found plenty of brilliancy, as in the audience, and plenty of variety during those 17 minutes from 9:03 to 9:20. But even if we could not "follow through" it was all such good fun—what with the audience and members of the orchestra understanding each other thoroughly—that it was rather enjoyable.

Vivaldi's concerto in D minor, with its three contrasting movements, was the opening number. Some strenuous work was accomplished by the strings in the first and last movements—the "Maestoso" and the "Allegro"—reminding of Handel in his palmy days now and then.

* * *

BUT THAT lovely "Largo"—which came between the other two like a calm upon a tempestous sea—was played with exquisite tenderness, dying away to a faint whisper toward the end, until there really lived nothing "twixt it and silence." In the prelude to "Lohengrin" the strings attained some ethereal effects, especially in the upper reaches.

Beethoven's fifth symphony, the C minor—which brought the well-balanced program to a fitting close—was given an authorative reading, Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation being very different from that of contemporaries.

* * *

THOSE grotesque, fugue-like passages in the third movement were played with a cumbersome effect, while that song of triumph in the finale afforded the brass choir an opportunity to reveal its adequacy.

Koussevitzky is one of the most picturesque conductors on the boards these days, and seldom makes an unnecessary move. The effects he obtains certainly justify the reputation with which he has been acclaimed.

Tschaikowsky, Stravinsky, Strauss and Handel are represented on this afternoon's program at the mosque.

From Harvey Gaul Page
PITTSBURGH POST-GAZETTE, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1929

Press-Nov.3

Boston Symphony Orchestra Impresses At Matinee Concert

By WILLIAM R. MITCHEL,
Press Music Critic.

IT WAS worth the price of admission just to hear that stringed choir of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Handel concerto—the opening number of the matinee program given by this fine organization as the second of its pair of concerts under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Assn.—yesterday in Syria Mosque.

We will go even further than that: It was worth the price of admission to hear those two violins and the 'cello in the brief episodical passages that recurred now and then, for seldom have we heard a more exquisite effect than that obtained by three artists. And it was worth the price of admission to hear those double basses which, throughout, performed in such a wonderful manner.

* * *

Yesterday afternoon's affair was rather informal, although the program arranged by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky—that thrilling director who never makes a false move—was one of the best we have heard at a soiree of this sort.

Handel's concerto for strings (opus 6, No. 10), was made up of the usual overture leading into the allegro, an air, the lento, the allegro moderato and the finale. Without a doubt it far surpassed—in our humble opinion—the Vivaldi concerto played the evening before at the inaugural concert of the orchestra association's fourteenth season—with a particularly lovely slow movement.

* * *

We heard, also, a Strauss interlude, Stravinsky's suite from "The Fire Bird," with its five contrasting movements, and Tschaikowsky's B minor symphony No. 6, the "Pathetic." There is some particularly enchanting solo work for the clarinet in that five-four waltz rhythm of the allegro congrazia—like that "two legs sat upon three legs" jingle—and those stinging pizzicatti scale passages for the strings were tensely effective.

* * *

But it is in the last movement you will find the Russian at his best: not, as some commentators seem to think, all noise and confusion, as in a "Tschilds" or a "Tschompson" restaurant with its clatter of "tschina."

Dr. Koussevitzky is one of the most picturesque figures on the podium these days, and the effects he produces with his excellent body of musicians certainly have not been surpassed by other visiting orchestras—in recent years, at least.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
NOV 1 - 1929

Boston Symphony Here.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived in the city today for the annual concerts in Syria Mosque tonight and tomorrow afternoon. The major work tonight will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSBURGH
POST-GAZETTE
NOV 1 - 1929

Society Takes Boxes For Annual Concert Of Boston Symphony

A notable assemblage of society will be seen tonight in the Syria Mosque at the annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Numerous box parties have been planned to hear Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his orchestra, which comprises 110 players.

Mrs. William Thaw, Jr., Mrs. William Watson Smith, Dr. and Mrs. W. J. Holland and Mr. and Mrs. H. H. McClintic will have box parties. Among other box patrons will be Dr. and Mrs. Ogden M. Edwards, Mrs. Enoch Rauh, Mrs. Horrace Forbes Baker, Mrs. H. C. Cooper, Mrs. George E. Tener, Mrs. William M. McKelvey, Mrs. James Edward Lewis, Mrs. George A. Harwood, Mrs. Samuel McClay, Mrs. A. L. Humphrey.

Mrs. H. K. Hitchcock, Mrs. Daniel M. Clemson, Mrs. George P. Bassett, Jr., Mrs. Nathaniel Spear, Mrs. Ralph Flinn, Mrs. Walter F. Schleiter, Mrs. John W. Lawrence, Mrs. L. Gerald Firth, Mrs. Mortimer Miller, Mrs. W. H. R. Hilliard.

Mrs. Leon Falk, Jr., Mrs. Henry R. Rea, Mrs. Charles J. Ramsburg, Mrs. W. W. Wattles, Mrs. R. S. Smith, Mrs. Robert S. McCague, Mrs. John H. Kerr, Mrs. Joseph A. Herron, Mrs. Henry Vaughan Blaxter and Mrs. Paul B. Straub.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
NOV 2 - 1929

Society Attends Symphony Concert

Fashionable Assemblage Congregates In Syria Mosque To Welcome Boston Symphony; Dinners Precede Program.

GLANCING over a symphony audience, after a particularly brilliant interpretation of a musical composition, one is pleasantly reassured that Americans are not in any immediate danger of losing their musical appreciation. It was an artistic as well as fashionable assemblage that crowded Syria Mosque last night to welcome Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Countless motor cars drew up before the Mosque long before the program was scheduled to begin, groups congregated in the foyer and inside the concert hall chatting with friends. It was a scene similar to opera night and elaborately gowned women and men in evening dress contributed a colorful atmospheric note.

Many men and women prominent in public life were present as well as several groups of the younger social set.

A number of dinner parties preceded the concert.

Previous to the playing of Beethoven's "Symphony 5 in C Minor" an intermission was held. Mrs. John Freeman was seen in conversation with Mrs. S. G. Cooper, the latter in a gown of fine black lace. Guests in the same box were Mrs. James Todd of Sewickley in a gown of the fashionable black crepe and Mrs. Tracey Guthrie in white crepe with floral border design.

ELABORATE GOWNS.

Mrs. Daniel M. Clemson in a gown of colorfully patterned metallic cloth was entertaining Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Harden Church, the latter in a gown of burgundy lace and Mr. and Mrs. William Maclay Hall. Mrs. Hall's gown was an attractive model of eggshell tulle with metallic motif. Howard Irish was also seen in the Clemson box. Visiting there for a brief chat was Mrs. George Bassett, who wore a gown of darkest blue crepe. In the latter's party at a neighboring box was Mrs. William Thaw in a transparent wrap of vivid violet shade and Miss Dohrman in an ensemble of black gown and wrap. Miss Anne Griffith, with them was wearing a gown of flesh chiffon crystal beaded top and skirt of black with similar motif of clusters of beads. In a box to the right of the auditorium was seen Mrs. W. H. Hillard in a wisteria hued gown with rhinestone trimming, Mrs. William L. Mellon in a metallic gown of delicate floral pattern, Mrs. Mortimer Miller in eggshell satin and Mrs. William Terrell Johnson in a gown of what chiffon combined with delicate black lace.

Rosamond Fitch, a debutante of this season, was seen chatting with a party composed of Mr. and Mrs. John Gardner Woods, the latter in a gown of apple green satin, Charles Woods, Miss Eleanor George, also in green satin and Morrison Fitch. Miss Fitch wore a frock of chiffon with painted flower motif.

Mrs. George McCook, seen in the hall, was wearing a gown of black net and Mrs. I. D. Wolf in another group wore a black velvet wrap over a gown of dark beige fish net.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
NOV 3 - 1929

KOUSSEVITZSKY CUTS T

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZSKY, the brill conductor, who once played the big ba like a New York banker than like a some liberty with Vivaldi's concerto in D m Symphony Orchestra at Syria Mosque on Fr The concerto was written for orchestra sevitzsky didn't use the organ.

Of course, he had a perfect alibi—the Mo

And it may seem entirely out of order to of the Mosque should undertake to instal an possesses in our incomparable Carnegie Mu organs in the United States, presided over acknowledged master.

Saill, the greater size of the Mosque tal majority of the other big concerts there, and an organ is a kind of anomaly, believe it or no

...lity, and en-
...article, next
...rican Weekly.

T MATT

$1

These Beauti

Boston Symphony Opens Season

Brilliant Audience at Mosque for Inaugural Concert—Koussevitzky Leads His Men Through Fine Program, Although "Polichinello" Eludes Our Vigilance—Beethoven's Fifth Given Majestic Reading.

By WILLIAM R. MITCHEL,
Press Music Critic.

WHEN Dr. Serge Koussevitzky—conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra which opened the fourteenth season of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Assn. — stepped upon the podium at Syria Mosque, last night, we all felt something better than usual was in store for us; for Serge looked mighty well pleased, confident that his 110 men were in the pink of condition.

Nor were we disappointed. The orchestra played as well as the conductor knew it would. That was no small audience either, for all the choice seats seemed to be pretty well filled, although there was a vacant chair to be observed here and there.

* * *

OF THE offerings on the program we liked best of all, perhaps, the Stravinsky suite from the ballet, "Petrouchka" who is revealed in the program annotations as a sort of "Polichinello," always in trouble, seemingly.

Stravinsky made it up of a Russian dance, "Petrouchka," himself, a grand carnival, a dance of nurses, a bear and a peasant playing the hand-organ, the merchant and the gypsies, the dance of the coachman and the grooms and, at the end, the masqueraders.

TRY AS we would, though, it was a mighty ticklish task to "follow through," where one led into the next. We fondly imagined we had it now, but the next moment it had escaped us, altogether.

Then, when there came a brief pause—between the "Petrouchka" and the "Grand Carnival" (or was it between the grand carnival and the nurses' dance?)—we were fearful the piano player—who was to double on the harp in the very next number—would not make it in time, as he hurried across that vast stage from one instrument to the other. But he did, thank goodness, and we breathed easier, once more.

* * *

ALWAYS one can count on Stravinsky to say something different, in a different manner, In last night's "something," one found plenty of brilliancy, as in the audience, and plenty of variety during those 17 minutes from 9:03 to 9:20. But even if we could not "follow through" it was all such good fun—what with the audience and members of the orchestra understanding each other thoroughly—that it was rather enjoyable.

Vivaldi's concerto in D minor, with its three contrasting movements, was the opening number. Some strenuous work was accomplished by the strings in the first and last movements—the "Maestoso" and the "Allegro"—reminding of Handel in his palmy days now and then.

* * *

BUT THAT lovely "Largo"—which came between the other two like a calm upon a tempestous sea—was played with exquisite tenderness, dying away to a faint whisper toward the end, until there really lived nothing "twixt it and silence." In the prelude to "Lohengrin" the strings attained some ethereal effects, especially in the upper reaches.

Beethoven's fifth symphony, the C minor—which brought the well-balanced program to a fitting close—was given an authorative reading, Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation being very different from that of contemporaries.

* * *

THOSE grotesque, fugue-like passages in the third movement were played with a cumbersome effect, while that song of triumph in the finale afforded the brass choir an opportunity to reveal its adequacy.

Koussevitzky is one of the most picturesque conductors on the boards these days, and seldom makes an unnecessary move. The effects he obtains certainly justify the reputation with which he has been acclaimed.

Tschaikowsky, Stravinsky, Strauss and Handel are represented on this afternoon's program at the mosque.

PITTSBURGH POST-GAZETTE, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1929
From Harvey Gaul Page

Boston Symphony.

There are always orchestra rumors.

"Did you hear Batoninsky resigned?" asks In-the-Know.

"Do you know that Octavovitch has quit?" inquires Wise-acre.

And every band that comes here brings rumbling—and generally unfounded—reports of this and that.

A fortnight ago when Serge Koussevitzky was here the story came out of Huntington avenue that this was the swan song of the Boston Symphony, and that the famous organization would no longer take to the road.

So we asked May Beegle, and May Beegle asked the manager, and the manager asked Serge Koussevitzky, and Serge asked the property man, and they all said with one accord: "Nonsense, we'll be back every year as long as the leaves turn. There are two cities we like, Buffalo and Pittsburgh. Discredit all rumors."

Which is good news. Had Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony withdrawn it would have left us entirely at the tender mercies of our mid-western orchestras—and that would have been a serious matter. Not that anyone can blame an orchestra for not wanting to take to the road when there is capacity business at home (at Symphony Hall it is S. R. O. with families inheriting seats) but at the same time there is a marvelous work to be done by such an organization touring.

This column hopes Boston never quits.

* * *

147

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS

Koussevitzky Praises American Musical Public

Serge Koussevitzky, distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has been engaged by the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts Enterprises to open its season at the Murat theater, Thursday evening, October 31, in a recent interview described music in America as it has impressed him during his five years as conductor of the Boston Orchestra.

"A phenomenal musical rennaissance" was the keynote of his description given to the French reporters who sought him at his home in the Rue Colignon in Paris. "Americans have the active temperament," he asserted. "Every one is active, and especially the women. Therefore they have stimulated orchestral development just as they have created immense business enterprises. The American people have an inordinate genius for growth.

"What is most stimulating about the musical situation in America is that the majority of the people have musical taste. In Europe one finds always a certain circle who attend concerts, but in America it is the rank and file who form an enthusiastic audience."

Mr. Koussevitzky gave as specific instances of America's musical development "her twenty superb orchestras" and also "her promising young composers, such as Aaron Copeland, Roger Sessions and Carpentier." The conductor believes that jazz has finished its major role as an influence in American music and will henceforth be relegated to the realm of dance. He also regards Stravinsky as perhaps the outstanding influence in modern music in America. However, no matter how much modern musicians have been influenced by this composer, they are always striving to break away from this influence, too. A real musician is always influenced by evolution and not by imitation, the director said.

Serge Koussevitzky received the honorary degree of doctor of laws at Harvard last June when President Lowell characterized him as one "who has brought to us from Russia and western Europe the treasures of great music." Koussevitzky was the first conductor to be so honored by Harvard University.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

Boston Symphony Last Heard Here In Season of 1912

The Boston Symphony orchestra, which will open the twenty-fourth annual season of concerts of the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts Enterprises, was last heard in Indianapolis in February 1912, seventeen years ago.

At that time it was recognized as one of the world's outstanding symphonic organizations and has maintained that reputation undiminished to this day.

Under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor who has presided over its concerts for the last five years the Boston symphony has ventured rarely from the Atlantic seaboard cities.

A jorney as far westward as Indianapolis is a real event in its history. The orchestra plays five series of concerts in Greater Boston, one in Providence, R. I., and two in New York, leaving it but little time for activities elsewhere. Its itinerary, therefore, is confined to a one-week trip West in the autumn.

Chance for Comparison.

On that excursion this year the orchestra will stop in Indianapolis on Thursday night, Oct. 31. An opportunity then will be had by the music lovers of the city to compare its performance with those of the New York, Philadelphia, Cincinnati and other leading organizations heard here in recent years.

The Duncan dancers, who will be presented in the second of the Talbot concerts Nov. 25, have in New York and will concert program ne noon, after which coast-to-c

CON

COMING OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AN OCTOBER EVENT

SERGE KOUSS

The Ile de France brought to New York September 24 a distinguished passenger, Serge Koussevitzky, who has returned to America as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and is now preparing this organization for the opening of its forty-ninth season in Symphony hall, Boston, October 11. A tour of only one week will be made by the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning October 28, reaching Indianapolis on October 31, for the opening concert of the twenty-fourth annual season of the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts Enterprises in the Murat theater.

The high position held by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is illustrated in the story now current of the engaging of this famous organization for the dedication of the Hall of Music of the University of Minnesota on October 28. Mrs. Carlyle Scott, impressario, of Minneapolis, was approached by the board of directors as to the most fitting attraction with which to open the new hall. Her conviction being that this would be the Boston Symphony Orchestra, she was authorized not only by the officials of the university but fortified with letters from the Governor of Minnesota and other officials of that state to go to Boston and obtain the services of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky, at any cost. The result is that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will go to Minneapolis with a contract for $10,000 and all expenses paid. The obtaining of this engagement for Minneapolis was the reason why a Thursday evening concert will open the Talbot series, the other four being Monday evening concerts, as Mrs. Talbot changed her original date of October 28 to October 31 at the request of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in order it might go to Minneapolis.

The four other offerings of the Talbot season will be, the Isadore Duncan Dancers, with Irma and twelve of the children from Moscow, November 25; La Argentina, famous dancer, from Spain, January 27; one performance of grand opera presented by the German Grand Opera Company, February 24 and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, Frederick Stock, conductor, March 3.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR
OCT 6 - 192

nerchor, Dec. 9.

3. Serge Koussevitsky, Russian conductor, who arrived in the United States Sept. 24 to begin his fifth year as leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra which plays at the Murat Oct. 31.

4. The Pro Arte string quartet of Brussels which will play for the Maennerchor Feb. 9.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR
OCT 6 - 192

BOSTON CONDUCTOR BACK FROM EUROPE IN OPTIMISTIC MOOD

The Ile de France brought to New York Sept. 24 as perhaps its most distinguished passenger Serge Koussevitzky, returning from Europe to open the forty-ninth season of the Boston Symphony orchestra Oct. 11.

The great Russian leader, now preparing for his sixth American season, will come to Indianapolis with his orchestra for the first concert of the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts Enterprises series Oct. 31.

Koussevitzky said to reporters on his arrival that he was confident that a season of unusual musical interest was in store.

He has in the course of the summer conferred with the foremost living composers, and accordingly has brought back in his portfolio a suite from the new ballet of Prokofieff, "L'Enfant Prodigue," which he will give its first American performance.

Has New Symphony.

New American scores which he will likewise introduce are a symphony of Aaron Copeland, and the latest work of Werner Josten. An interesting revival will be a Woodwind "Concerto of Spohr," which was lately recommended to the conductor by Richard Strauss.

Several years ago London and Paris became aware of a quite extraordinary Russian conductor. Under the transforming hand of Serge Koussevitzky a classic symphony would glow with fresh life, a romantic score would sing with a new and unprecedented eloquence, a composition of our own day would reveal an unsuspected creative vitality.

First Season Surprise.

Koussevitzky's first sseason with the Boston Symphony orchestra astonished even those who had expected the most and in succeeding seasons conductor and orchestra have touched new heights of executive perfection, tonal splendor and interpretative vision.

Besides the Boston Symphony, the Chicago Symphony, Frederick Stock, conductor; two internationally famed dancing attractions, the Isadora Duncan dancers and La Argentina, "queen of the castanets;" one performance of grand opera by the German Grand Opera company will be presented by the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts Enterprises in a subscription series of five evening subscribed concerts at the Murat theater for the season 1929-30.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS
OCT 12 192

BOSTON ORCHESTRA NOTED FOR ITS LEADERSHIP AND PERSONNEL

No musical event in several seasons has surpassed in interest the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to play on the evening of the last day of this month at the Murat theater. This orchestra, unheard in Indianapolis for many years, has had a long and honorable history, during much of which it stood unquestionably first among American orchestras. With the development of other fine orchestras in America, which is now recognized as having the greatest symphonic organizations in the world, the Boston Orchestra still occupies a place among the foremost. Its conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, who has been its leader continuously for the last five years, is ranked by critics as among the three or four greatest of the world's living conductors and one of the most interesting personalities in music.

In addition to having this kind of leadership the Boston Orchestra is rich in the qualities of the players who respond to his baton. In the past as well as in the present the Boston Orchestra has been notable for its personnel. Such a musician as Franz Kneisel who formed his famous quartet from the string players of this orchestra, is typical of its line of concertmasters. Such names as George Longy, composer and violinist, Georges Grisez, the clarinetist; Emil Ferir, the viola player, indicate only a few of the virtuosos who have sat for years in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concertmaster's chair is now held by Richard Burgin, a celebrated Russian musician. Mr. Burgin came to America to take this position in 1920. He had been concertmaster to more than one great conductor in Europe, and was also admired for his recitals and activities in chamber music. Richard Burgin is known in America not only by his appearance as soloist with the orchestra, but by many recitals and by the string quartet and the trio which bear his name. Last season, he was appointed regular assistant conductor of the orchestra.

The seniority among the string leaders at present is held by Julius Theodorowicz, the second concertmaster, who was one of the original Kneisel Quartet. Jean Bedetti is the first cellist, and one of the finest in the world. Jean Lefranc, leader of the violas, is a virtuoso of the same sort. What these artists are to their instruments, so is George Laurent to the flute. Also masters of unusual quality are Fernand Gillet, the first oboe; George Hamelin, the first clarinet; Abden Laus, first bassoon, and Louis Speyer, the English horn virtuoso. Georges Mager is the brilliant first trumpet; George Bosttcher, whom the orchestra was fortunate in obtaining last season, the leader of the French horns, and Joannes Rochut is a distinguished first trombone. Another noteworthy member of the orchestra is Bernard Zighera, the first harp.

The concert of the Boston Orchestra Thursday, October 31, will be the first of five events this season under the direction of the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts Enterprises. The Isadora Duncan Dancers, twelve children with Irma Duncan from Moscow, will come Monday evening, November 25. La Argentina, famous dancer from Spain, will appear January 27. One performance of grand opera by the German Opera Company will be given February 24. The Chicago Symphony Orchestra, Frederick Stock, conductor, will be heard March 3.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR
OCT 19 1929

KOUSSEVITZKY QUALIFIES AS REGULAR "VOLGA BOATMAN"

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

Nothing, save his eloquent performances, reveals more clearly the artistic sincerity and devotion of Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra which plays at the Murat Oct. 31, than the circumstances of his career.

He first conducted as a boy of 12 when he led the local theater orchestra at his birthplace in the province of Tver, in northern Russia.

Attending the Conservatory at Moscow, he was required to study an instrument. He chose the double-bass, and the noted master, Ramboussec, was his teacher.

His proficiency upon this unusual instrument became so extraordinary that he toured all of Europe and became famous before he was even known as a conductor.

Organizes Orchestra.

Koussevitzky's abilities, indeed, were not of the sort to be so confined to a limited field, and from 1909 he devoted all his energies to [illegible] of the Volga river, and, taking his entire orchestra, together with soloists and a group of friends, made several voyages along the 2,500 miles of its basin. The party would port at each town along its bank, and announce a symphony concert in the local town hall. The country folk were of course astonished at this wonderful, new kind of music, but they were also both delighted and moved by it.

The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his orchestra, but not of his energies. He became conductor of the Russian state orchestra (formerly the court orchestra).

Europe Hears Him.

It was in 1920 that Koussevitzky was first heard as a conductor in western Europe. He assembled an orchestra in Paris, and has since conducted annually his series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" at the opera house. He is also invited annually to conduct a series as guest of Sir Henry Wood's orchestra in London. Principally through these concerts, but also by virtue of operatic performances in Paris and elsewhere, Koussevitzky has come to be regarded as the most brilliant, inspired, and inspiring conductor in that part of the world.

Each spring, since Koussevitzy became the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1924, he has returned at the conclusion of his American season to conduct his Paris and London series, which the European public evidently hold to be an indispensable part of their musical life.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES
OCT 19 1929

FAMOUS ORCHESTRA TO OPEN SEASON

Boston Symphony Will Be at the Murat Soon.

GREAT orchestra music, superb dancing and grand opera is the musical feast offered to Indiana and Indianapolis this season by the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts Enterprises.

Five evening attractions in the Murat, opening on Thursday evening, Oct. 31, with the world famous Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, are announced. The remaining four concerts on Monday evening will include the Isadora Duncan dancers, Nov. 25; La Argentina, Spain's famous dancer, Jan. 27; one performance of grand opera by the German Grand Opera Company, Feb. 24, and the Chicago Symphony orchestra, Frederick Stock conductor, March 3.

Individual tickets for any of the above concerts will be placed on sale Monday morning at the office of the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts Enterprises, Baldwin Piano Company.

For the first time in many years, to be exact, since February, 1912, the Boston Symphony orchestra is to visit Indianapolis, for a concert on Oct. 31. This orchestra, then reputed the greatest in the world, has in the intervening seventeen years added many glorious chapters to its illustrious history.

For five years the Boston Smyphony orchestra has been under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, the extraordinary Russian conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BRAZIL, INDIANA
TIMES & NEWS
OCT 1 91929

Ona B. Talbott Has Fine Program of Music Concerts

One of the finest series of concerts ever presented to music lovers of Indiana and Indianapolis is offered by the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts enterprises to be given in the Murat Theater. Five evening concerts to include the world famous Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor; October 31st; the Isadora Duncan dancers, twelve children of Isadora's School from Moscow, November 25; La Argentina, Spain's most famous dancer, January 27; one performance of grand opera, German Grand opera company and the Chicago Symphony orchestra, Frederick Stock, conductor, March 3rd.

Season tickets for the above sereies will be on sale until Monday morning, October 21st, when single tickets for the concerts will be on sale at the new office of the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts Enterprises, the Baldwin Piano company, 35 Monument Circle, Indianapolis. Prices of season tickets, $10.00, $15.00, $20,00, $22.00, $24.20-and $27.50; these prices include tax.

There is perhaps no other city in the country enjoying the advantage of the greatest in musical art that is not financially protected by a group of public spirited citizens with the exception of Indianapolis. Ona B. Talbot has for the past twenty-five years carried the financial burden alone, and it is not only a privilege but an obligation that now the people of Indiana show their appreciation by attending the concerts this season.

The superlative performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are indeed a thing at which to wonder. But just how and why this organization has come to be one of the very greatest in world leaves little room for speculation or debate. In the autumn of 1924, Serge Koussevitzky first crossed the Atlantic to become the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. During his five years as leader of the Boston Symphony expectations have more than been fufilled, qualities have been found in his leadership which are said to be without equal.

With such a combination of a great orchestra and a great leader it is not surprising that the Boston Symphony orchestra is regarded as one of the finest achievements in the musical performances of our day. There are waiting lists for every subscription series, and in the case of Indianapolis it was necessary to make the contract two years ago, with a guarantee of five thousand dollars.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR
OCT 20

A standing audience and orchestra greeted Dr. Serge Koussevitzky Friday afternoon [illegible] stepped upon the stage of Symphony hall, Boston, to begin the opening concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, in its forty-ninth season.

The Boston orchestra, directed by Koussevitzky, plays at the Murat in the first concert of the Talbot series Thursday evening, Oct. 31.

Personnel Constant.

In recording this event the Boston papers commented that "Not a single new face was to be seen in the orchestra of 110 musicians assembled upon the stage." The critics further attributed the marvelous finish and ensemble of the introductory performance to this constant personnel, and to the continuous unifying command of the Russian conductor, through his five seasons in America.

According to the Boston Globe of the following morning (Saturday, Oct. 12), "Dr." Koussevitsky comes back to an orchestra moided to his will and made into a superb musical instrument, and to an audience assembled in large measure by the power of his remarkable personality. The present position of the Boston symphony as an orchestra again unsurpassed in the world, has been won by his hard and intense effort."

Mary F. Watkins, in the Herald-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS
OCT 19 1929

148

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO BRING 110 MEN UNDER KOUSSEVITSKY

One hundred and ten musicians of exceptional quality headed by one of the world's greatest conductors Serge Koussevitsky will arrive in Indianapolis for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the last night of this month at the Murat theater.

Only the older generation of music lovers remembers the last appearance of the Boston Orchestra in Indianapolis. To any one familiar with American music affairs, past or present, its coming must be awaited with keen interest, for it has a long history of holding a foremost place among symphony orchestras. After a brief wartime lapse it has, to all accounts, been restored to as great a brilliancy as it ever attained in its long vareer if it has not reached an even higher standard under Koussevitsky, a musical genius.

What a luxury such a musical organization is, is indicated by remarks in the Boston Globe of October 11 in the course of a review of its opening concert of this season:

"Dr. Koussevitzky, returning for his sixth season as conductor of the Bosto Symphony, comes back to an orchestra he has molded to his will and made into a superb musical instrument. The present position of the Boston Symphony as an orchestra again unsurpassed in the world, has been won by his hard and intense effort. A financial statement from the trustees, inserted in yesterday's program, bore witness to the high cost of maintaining such an orchestra. The deficit on last season, with every ticket sold, was $145,493.68, of which sum $101,487.67 has thus far been contributed.

The Boston Orchestra's concert Thursday, October 31, will be the first of five events for the season under the direction of the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts Enterprises. Two dancing attractions, referred to elsewhere, will follow. The German Grand Opera Company, heard last season, will come for a single performance February 24 and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra will close the season March 3.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES
OCT 22

MUSIC EVENTS WIN PRAISE OF CIVIC LEADERS

Mayor, Merchants Group and C. of C. Indorse Talbot Concerts.

Cultural development of Indianapolis, particularly through the musical program billed for the city this winter, was praised today in official indorsements by Mayor L. Ert Slack, the Chamber of Commerce, and the Merchants Association of Indianapolis.

Each commended the presentation by the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts Enterprises, of the Boston Symphony orchestra in concert at the Murat temple, Oct. 31.

"It is the particular business of the mayor of the city to aid in civic development," said Mayor Slack. "This does not include merely the physical development, but many times involves development along lines of music, art, education, and general public spirit.

Symphony Orchestra Leads

"An opportunity is given now to patronize an outstanding musical event on the occasion of the Boston Symphony orchestra here. It is one of the greatest musical organizations in the world, and Indianapolis is fortunate in obtaining a concert at this time.

"As a matter of civic enterprise the concert should be well patronized by the people of Indianapolis," he concluded.

"Indianapolis is one of the first twenty cities in this country," Paul Q. Richey, president of the Chamber of Commerce declared. "If Indianapolis is to grow or even hold its place, it must have more than population.

Culture Is Essential

"It must have more than industrial development, financial development, or even more than schools and libraries can bring to it. It must have cultural development—only possible through bringing to its citizenry the best of art and music.

"One of the greatest movements of this sort is bringing to this city the Boston Symphony orchestra," he added.

"For thirty years Mrs. Talbot has maintained concerts in this city," said Herman P. Lieber, president of the Merchants Association. "She has the knowledge and talent for giving Indianapolis the best in music. The Boston orchestra is one of the two best in the world. Every music lover should hear it."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS
OCT 22

The coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Indianapolis for a concert at the Murat theater on Thursday night of next week is regarded as a musical event of such unusual importance that action has been taken by the board of directors of the Merchants' Association, the president of the Chamber of Commerce and the mayor in recognition of its significance. This orchestra of 110 men is rated by experienced critics generally as one of the finest symphonic organizations of the world and its conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, is classed among the three or four greatest living conductors.

Paul Richey, president of the Chamber of Commerce, in a letter to members speaking of the importance of cultural development to a city, says: "One of the greatest movements of this sort for the development of our community is the bringing to this city of the great symphony orchestras, such as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is pre-eminently among the first organizations of the world. We hope that every member of the Indianapolis Chamber of Commerce, recognizing this important contribution to the growth of the community, will take it upon himself to do whatever possible toward increasing the appreciation of this work."

"To make a city complete," says the board of directors of the Merchants' Association, in a letter signed by Herman P. Lieber, president, "it requires not only stores and factories, schools and churches, parks and playgrounds, but it needs many unusual cultural activities. * * * We wish now to call your attention to another activity in this city, namely the concerts of Ona B. Talbot. For thirty years Mrs. Talbot has maintained concerts in this city which we believe any one will agree have been of the highest order. This year the first concert is by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on October 31. The Boston Orchestra is one of the two best orchestras of the world; every music lover ought to hear it."

"This is one of the greatest musical organizations in the world," says Mayor Slack in a letter, "and Indianapolis is fortunate in obtaining a concert at this time. As a matter of civic enterprise this orchestra should be patronized by the people of Indianapolis, and there should not be an empty seat in the house on that night."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR
OCT 23

Mayor Calls on Public to Support Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert

Mayor L. Ert Slack yesterday urged public support of the Boston Symphony orchestra at its appearance at the Murat theater Oct. 31.

In a statement made public, Mayor Slack said:

"It is the particular business of the mayor of the city to aid in civic development and this does not merely include the physical development, but many times involves development along the lines of music, art, education and general public spirit. Our citizens now realize that great improvement in public spirit has arisen in the last two years, and we are all desirous of much more improvement, especially along the lines of music and other high-class entertainment.

"An opportunity is now given to patronize an outstanding musical event on the occasion of the Boston Symphony orchestra here at the Murat theater on the evening of Oct. 31. It is one of the greatest musical organizations in the world and Indianapolis is fortunate in obtaining a concert at this time. As a matter of civic enterprise this orchestra should be well patronized by the people of Indianapolis, and there should not be an empty seat in the house on that night."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR
OCT 19 1928

KOUSSEVITZKY QUALIFIES AS REGULAR "VOLGA BOATMAN"

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

Nothing, save his eloquent performances, reveals more clearly the artistic sincerity and devotion of Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra which plays at the Murat Oct. 31, than the circumstances of his career. He first conducted as a boy of 12, when he led the local theater orchestra at his birthplace in the province of Tver, in northern Russia.

Attending the Conservatory at Moscow, he was required to study an instrument. He chose the double-bass, and the noted master, Ramboussec, was his teacher.

His proficiency upon this unusual instrument became so extraordinary that he toured all of Europe and became famous before he was even known as a conductor.

Organizes Orchestra.

Koussevitzky's abilities, indeed, were not of the sort to be so confined to a limited field, and from 1909 he devoted all his energies to conducting. He organized his own symphony orchestra in Moscow which soon came to be considered the finest in Russia.

CONCLUDED FROM PAGE 3.

He chartered a large steamer on the Volga river, and, taking his entire orchestra, together with soloists and a group of friends, made several voyages along the 2,500 miles of its basin. The party would port at each town along its bank, and announce a symphony concert in the local town hall. The country folk were of course astonished at this wonderful, new kind of music, but they were also both delighted and moved by it.

The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his orchestra, but not of his energies. He became conductor of the Russian state orchestra (formerly the court orchestra).

Europe Hears Him.

It was in 1920 that Koussevitzky was first heard as a conductor in western Europe. He assembled an orchestra in Paris, and has since conducted annually his series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" at the opera house. He is also invited annually to conduct a series as guest of Sir Henry Wood's orchestra in London. Principally through these concerts, but also by virtue of operatic performances in Paris and elsewhere, Koussevitzky has come to be regarded as the most brilliant, inspired, and inspiring conductor in that part of the world.

Each spring, since Koussevitzy became the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1924, he has returned at the conclusion of his American season to conduct his Paris and London series, which the European public evidently hold to be an indispensable part of their musical life.

OCT 19 1928

eane.
ow, inasmuch n advance of mps for Coffin
rality nomina-

and prospective purch
sion here.
The federal governm
in the plant it is to bu
The various lessees install their own m
power house

Boston Symphony Will Be at the Murat Soon.

GREAT orchestra music, superb dancing and grand opera is the musical feast offered to Indiana and Indianapolis this season by the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts Enterprises.

Five evening attractions in the Murat, opening on Thursday evening, Oct. 31, with the world famous Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, are announced. The remaining four concerts on Monday evening will include the Isadora Duncan dancers, Nov. 25; La Argentina, Spain's famous dancer, Jan. 27; one performance of grand opera by the German Grand Opera Company, Feb. 24, and the Chicago Symphony orchestra, Frederick Stock conductor, March 3.

Individual tickets for any of the above concerts will be placed on sale Monday morning at the office of the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts Enterprises, Baldwin Piano Company.

For the first time in many years, to be exact, since February, 1912, the Boston Symphony orchestra is to visit Indianapolis, for a concert on Oct. 31. This orchestra, then reputed the greatest in the world, has in the intervening seventeen years added many glorious chapters to its illustrious history.

For five years the Boston Smyphony orchestra has been under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, the extraordinary Russian conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BRAZIL, INDIANA
TIMES & NEWS
OCT 1 9 1928

Ona B. Talbott Has Fine Program of Music Concerts

One of the finest series of concerts ever presented to music lovers of Indiana and Indianapolis is offered by the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts enterprises to be given in the Murat Theater. Five evening concerts to include the world famous Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor; October 31st; the Isadora Duncan dancers, twelve children of Isadora's School from Moscow, November 25; La Argentina, Spain's most famous dancer, January 27; one performance of grand opera, German Grand opera company and the Chicago Symphony orchestra, Frederick Stock, conductor, March 3rd.

Season tickets for the above sereies will be on sale until Monday morning, October 21st, when single tickets for the concerts will be on sale at the new office of the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts Enterprises, the Baldwin Piano company, 35 Monument Circle, Indianapolis. Prices of season tickets, $10.00, $15.00, $20,00, $22.00, $24.20—and $27.50; these prices include tax.

There is perhaps no other city in the country enjoying the advantage of the greatest in musical art that is not financially protected by a group of public spirited citizens with the exception of Indianapolis. Ona B. Talbot has for the past twenty-five years carried the financial burden alone, and it is not only a privilege but an obligation that now the people of Indiana show their appreciation by attending the concerts this season.

The superlative performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are indeed a thing at which to wonder. But just how and why this organization has come to be one of the very greatest in world leaves little room for speculation or debate. In the autumn of 1924, Serge Koussevitzky first crossed the Atlantic to become the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. During his five years as leader of the Boston Symphony expectations have more than been fufilled, qualities have been found in his leadership which are said to be without equal.

With such a combination of a great orchestra and a great leader it is not surprising that the Boston Symphony orchestra is regarded as one of the finest achievements in the musical performances of our day. There are waiting lists for every subscription series, and in the case of Indianapolis it was necessary to make the contract two years ago, with a guarantee of five thousand dollars.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR
OCT 20

A standing audience and orchestra greeted Dr. Serge Koussevitzky Friday afternoon, [illegible] stepped upon the stage of Symphony hall, Boston, to begin the opening concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, in its forty-ninth season.

The Boston orchestra, directed by Koussevitzky, plays at the Murat in the first concert of the Talbot series Thursday evening, Oct. 31.

Personnel Constant.

In recording this event the Boston papers commented that "Not a single new face was to be seen in the orchestra of 110 musicians assembled upon the stage." The critics further attributed the marvelous finish and ensemble of the introductory performance to this constant personnel, and to the continuous unifying command of the Russian conductor, through his five seasons in America.

According to the Boston Globe of the following morning (Sat[illegible]y, [illegible] "Dr." Koussevi[illegible] Schube[illegible] The entire company, Mme included, wafted themselves lissomly and beautifully about the carpeted stage. Enthusiastic plaudits greeted all the exhibitions."

Mary F. Watkins, in the Herald-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS
OCT 19 1928

148

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO BRING 110 MEN UNDER KOUSSEVITSKY

One hundred and ten musicians of exceptional quality headed by one of the world's greatest conductors Serge Koussevitsky will arrive in Indianapolis for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the last night of this month at the Murat theater.

Only the older generation of music lovers remembers the last appearance of the Boston Orchestra in Indianapolis. To any one familiar with American music affairs, past or present, its coming must be awaited with keen interest, for it has a long history of holding a foremost place among symphony orchestras. After a brief wartime lapse it has, to all accounts, been restored to as great a brilliancy as it ever attained in its long vareer if it has not reached an even higher standard under Koussevitsky, a musical genius.

What a luxury such a musical organization is, is indicated by remarks in the Boston Globe of October 11 in the course of a review of its opening concert of this season:

"Dr. Koussevitzky, returning for his sixth season as conductor of the Bosto Symphony, comes back to an orchestra he has molded to his will and made into a superb musical instrument. The present position of the Boston Symphony as an orchestra again unsurpassed in the world, has been won by his hard and intense effort. A financial statement from the trustees, inserted in yesterday's program, bore witness to the high cost of maintaining such an orchestra. The deficit on last season, with every ticket sold, was $145,493.68, of which sum $101,487.67 has thus far been contributed.

The Boston Orchestra's concert Thursday, October 31, will be the first of five events for the season under the direction of the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts Enterprises. Two dancing attractions, referred to elsewhere, will follow. The German Grand Opera Company, heard last season, will come for a single performance February 24 and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra will close the season March 3.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES
OCT 22

MUSIC EVENTS WIN PRAISE OF CIVIC LEADERS

Mayor, Merchants Group and C. of C. Indorse Talbot Concerts.

Cultural development of Indianapolis, particularly through the musical program billed for the city this winter, was praised today in official indorsements by Mayor L. Ert Slack, the Chamber of Commerce, and the Merchants Association of Indianapolis.

Each commended the presentation by the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts Enterprises, of the Boston Symphony orchestra in concert at the Murat temple, Oct. 31.

"It is the particular business of the mayor of the city to aid in civic development," said Mayor Slack. "This does not include merely the physical development, but many times involves development along lines of music, art, education, and general public spirit.

Symphony Orchestra Leads

"An opportunity is given now to patronize an outstanding musical event on the occasion of the Boston Symphony orchestra here. It is one of the greatest musical organizations in the world, and Indianapolis is fortunate in obtaining a concert at this time.

"As a matter of civic enterprise the concert should be well patronized by the people of Indianapolis," he concluded.

"Indianapolis is one of the first twenty cities in this country," Paul Q. Richey, president of the Chamber of Commerce declared. "If Indianapolis is to grow or even hold its place, it must have more than population.

Culture Is Essential

"It must have more than industrial development, financial development, or even more than schools and libraries can bring to it. It must have cultural development—only possible through bringing to its citizenry the best of art and music.

"One of the greatest movements of this sort is bringing to this city the Boston Symphony orchestra," he added.

"For thirty years Mrs. Talbot has maintained concerts in this city," said Herman P. Lieber, president of the Merchants Association. "She has the knowledge and talent for giving Indianapolis the best in music. The Boston orchestra is one of the two best in the world. Every music lover should hear it."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS
OCT 22

The coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Indianapolis for a concert at the Murat theater on Thursday night of next week is regarded as a musical event of such unusual importance that action has been taken by the board of directors of the Merchants' Association, the president of the Chamber of Commerce and the mayor in recognition of its significance. This orchestra of 110 men is rated by experienced critics generally as one of the finest symphonic organizations of the world and its conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, is classed among the three or four greatest living conductors.

Paul Richey, president of the Chamber of Commerce, in a letter to members speaking of the importance of cultural development to a city, says: "One of the greatest movements of this sort for the development of our community is the bringing to this city of the great symphony orchestras, such as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is pre-eminently among the first organizations of the world. We hope that every member of the Indianapolis Chamber of Commerce, recognizing this important contribution to the growth of the community, will take it upon himself to do whatever possible toward increasing the appreciation of this work."

"To make a city complete," says the board of directors of the Merchants' Association, in a letter signed by Herman P. Lieber, president, "it requires not only stores and factories, schools and churches, parks and playgrounds, but it needs many unusual cultural activities. * * * We wish now to call your attention to another activity in this city, namely the concerts of Ona B. Talbot. For thirty years Mrs. Talbot has maintained concerts in this city which we believe any one will agree have been of the highest order. This year the first concert is by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on October 31. The Boston Orchestra is one of the two best orchestras of the world; every music lover ought to hear it."

"This is one of the greatest musical organizations in the world," says Mayor Slack in a letter, "and Indianapolis is fortunate in obtaining a concert at this time. As a matter of civic enterprise this orchestra should be patronized by the people of Indianapolis, and there should not be an empty seat in the house on that night."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR
OCT 23

Mayor Calls on Public to Support Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert

Mayor L. Ert Slack yesterday urged public support of the Boston Symphony orchestra at its appearance at the Murat theater Oct. 31.

In a statement made public, Mayor Slack said:

"It is the particular business of the mayor of the city to aid in civic development and this does not merely include the physical development, but many times involves development along the lines of music, art, education and general public spirit. Our citizens now realize that great improvement in public spirit has arisen in the last two years, and we are all desirous of much more improvement, especially along the lines of music and other high-class entertainment.

"An opportunity is now given to patronize an outstanding musical event on the occasion of the Boston Symphony orchestra here at the Murat theater on the evening of Oct. 31. It is one of the greatest musical organizations in the world and Indianapolis is fortunate in obtaining a concert at this time. As a matter of civic enterprise this orchestra should be well patronized by the people of Indianapolis, and there should not be an empty seat in the house on that night."

148

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

OCT 1 1928

KOUSSEVITZKY QUALIFIES AS REGULAR "VOLGA BOATMAN"

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

Nothing, save his eloquent performances, reveals more clearly the artistic sincerity and devotion of Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra which plays at the Murat Oct. 31, than the circumstances of his career.

He first conducted as a boy of 12, when he led the local theater orchestra at his birthplace in the province of Tver, in northern Russia.

Attending the Conservatory at Moscow, he was required to study an instrument. He chose the double-bass, and the noted master, Ramboussec, was his teacher.

His proficiency upon this unusual instrument became so extraordinary that he toured all of Europe and became famous before he was even known as a conductor.

Organizes Orchestra.

Koussevitzky's abilities, indeed, were not of the sort to be so confined to a limited field, and from 1909 he devoted all his energies to

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES

OCT 1 1928

FAMOUS ORCHESTRA TO OPEN SEASON

Boston Symphony Will Be at the Murat Soon.

GREAT orchestra music, superb dancing and grand opera is the musical feast offered to Indiana and Indianapolis this season by the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts Enterprises.

Five evening attractions in the Murat, opening on Thursday evening, Oct. 31, with the world famous Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, are announced. The remaining four concerts on Monday evening will include the Isadora Duncan dancers, Nov. 25; La Argentina, Spain's famous dancer, Jan. 27; one performance of grand opera by the German Grand Opera Company, Feb. 24, and the Chicago Symphony orchestra, Frederick Stock conductor, March 3.

Individual tickets for any of the above concerts will be placed on sale Monday morning at the office of the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts Enterprises, Baldwin Piano Company.

For the first time in many years, to be exact, since February, 1912, the Boston Symphony orchestra is to visit Indianapolis, for a concert on Oct. 31. This orchestra, then reputed the greatest in the world, has in the intervening seventeen years added many glorious chapters to its illustrious history.

For five years the Boston Smyphony orchestra has been under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, the extraordinary Russian conductor.

...large steamer on the Volga river, and, taking his entire orchestra, together with soloists and a group of friends, made several voyages along the 2,500 miles of its basin. The party would port at each town along its bank, and announce a symphony concert in the local town hall. The country folk were of course astonished at this wonderful, new kind of music, but they were also both delighted and moved by it.

The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his orchestra, but not of his energies. He became conductor of the Russian state orchestra (formerly the court orchestra).

Europe Hears Him.

It was in 1920 that Koussevitzky was first heard as a conductor in western Europe. He assembled an orchestra in Paris, and has since conducted annually his series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" at the opera house. He is also invited annually to conduct a series as guest of Sir Henry Wood's orchestra in London. Principally through these concerts, but also by virtue of operatic performances in Paris and elsewhere, Koussevitzky has come to be regarded as the most brilliant, inspired, and inspiring conductor in that part of the world.

Each spring, since Koussevitzy became the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1924, he has returned at the conclusion of his American season to conduct his Paris and London series, which the European public evidently hold to be an indispensable part of their musical life.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BRAZIL, INDIANA
TIMES & ~~NEWS~~

OCT 1 1928

Ona B. Talbott Has Fine Program of Music Concerts

One of the finest series of concerts ever presented to music lovers of Indiana and Indianapolis is offered by the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts enterprises to be given in the Murat Theater. Five evening concerts to include the world famous Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor; October 31st; the Isadora Duncan dancers, twelve children of Isadora's School from Moscow, November 25; La Argentina, Spain's most famous dancer, January 27; one performance of grand opera, German Grand opera company and the Chicago Symphony orchestra, Frederick Stock, conductor, March 3rd.

Season tickets for the above sereies will be on sale until Monday morning, October 21st, when single tickets for the concerts will be on sale at the new office of the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts Enterprises, the Baldwin Piano company, 35 Monument Circle, Indianapolis. Prices of season tickets, $10.00, $15.00, $20,00, $22.00, $24.20-and $27.50; these prices include tax.

There is perhaps no other city in the country enjoying the advantage of the greatest in musical art that is not financially protected by a group of public spirited citizens with the exception of Indianapolis. Ona B. Talbot has for the past twenty-five years carried the financial burden alone, and it is not only a privilege but an obligation that now the people of Indiana show their appreciation by attending the concerts this season.

The superlative performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are indeed a thing at which to wonder. But just how and why this organization has come to be one of the very greatest in world leaves little room for speculation or debate. In the autumn of 1924, Serge Koussevitzky first crossed the Atlantic to become the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. During his five years as leader of the Boston Symphony expectations have more than been fufilled, qualities have been found in his leadership which are said to be without equal.

With such a combination of a great orchestra and a great leader it is not surprising that the Boston Symphony orchestra is regarded as one of the finest achievements in the musical performances of our day. There are waiting lists for every subscription series, and in the case of Indianapolis it was necessary to make the contract two years ago, with a guarantee of five thousand dollars.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

A standing audience and orchestra greeted Dr. Serge Koussevitzky Friday afternoon, Oct. 11, as he stepped upon the stage of Symphony hall, Boston, to begin the opening concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, in its forty-ninth season.

The Boston orchestra, directed by Koussevitzky, plays at the Murat in the first concert of the Talbot series Thursday evening, Oct. 31.

Personnel Constant.

In recording this event the Boston papers commented that "Not a single new face was to be seen in the orchestra of 110 musicians assembled upon the stage." The critics further attributed the marvelous finish and ensemble of the introductory performance to this constant personnel, and to the continuous unifying command of the Russian conductor, through his five seasons in America.

According to the Boston Globe of the following morning (Saturday, Oct. 12), "Dr." Koussevitsky comes back to an orchestra moided to his will and made into a superb musical instrument, and to an audience assembled in large measure by the power of his remarkable personality. The present position of the Boston symphony as an orchestra again unsurpassed in the world, has been won by his hard and intense effort."

Mary F. Watkins, in the Herald-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS

OCT 19 1928

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO BRING 110 MEN UNDER KOUSSEVITSKY

One hundred and ten musicians of exceptional quality headed by one of the world's greatest conductors Serge Koussevitsky will arrive in Indianapolis for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the last night of this month at the Murat theater.

Only the older generation of music lovers remembers the last appearance of the Boston Orchestra in Indianapolis. To any one familiar with American music affairs, past or present, its coming must be awaited with keen interest, for it has a long history of holding a foremost place among symphony orchestras. After a brief wartime lapse it has, to all accounts, been restored to as great a brilliancy as it ever attained in its long vareer if it has not reached an even higher standard under Koussevitsky, a musical genius.

What a luxury such a musical organization is, is indicated by remarks in the Boston Globe of October 11 in the course of a review of its opening concert of this season:

"Dr. Koussevitzky, returning for his sixth season as conductor of the Bosto Symphony, comes back to an orchestra he has molded to his will and made into a superb musical instrument. The present position of the Boston Symphony as an orchestra again unsurpassed in the world, has been won by his hard and intense effort. A financial statement from the trustees, inserted in yesterday's program, bore witness to the high cost of maintaining such an orchestra. The deficit on last season, with every ticket sold, was $145.493.68, of which sum $101.487.67 has thus far been contributed.

The Boston Orchestra's concert Thursday, October 31, will be the first of five events for the season under the direction of the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts Enterprises. Two dancing attractions, referred to elsewhere, will follow. The German Grand Opera Company, heard last season, will come for a single performance February 24 and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra will close the season March 3.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES

OCT 1

MUSIC EVENTS WIN PRAISE OF CIVIC LEADERS

Mayor, Merchants Group and C. of C. Indorse Talbot Concerts.

Cultural development of Indianapolis, particularly through the musical program billed for the city this winter, was praised today in official indorsements by Mayor L. Ert Slack, the Chamber of Commerce, and the Merchants Association of Indianapolis.

Each commended the presentation by the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts Enterprises, of the Boston Symphony orchestra in concert at the Murat temple, Oct. 31.

"It is the particular business of the mayor of the city to aid in civic development," said Mayor Slack. "This does not include merely the physical development, but many times involves development along lines of music, art, education, and general public spirit.

Symphony Orchestra Leads

"An opportunity is given now to patronize an outstanding musical event on the occasion of the Boston Symphony orchestra here. It is one of the greatest musical organizations in the world, and Indianapolis is fortunate in obtaining a concert at this time.

"As a matter of civic enterprise the concert should be well patronized by the people of Indianapolis," he concluded.

"Indianapolis is one of the first twenty cities in this country," Paul Q. Richey, president of the Chamber of Commerce declared. "If Indianapolis is to grow or even hold its place, it must have more than population.

Culture Is Essential

"It must have more than industrial development, financial development, or even more than schools and libraries can bring to it. It must have cultural development—only possible through bringing to its citizenry the best of art and music.

"One of the greatest movements of this sort is bringing to this city the Boston Symphony orchestra," he added.

"For thirty years Mrs. Talbot has maintained concerts in this city," said Herman P. Lieber, president of the Merchants Association. "She has the knowledge and talent for giving Indianapolis the best in music. The Boston orchestra is one of the two best in the world. Every music lover should hear it."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS

...22

The coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Indianapolis for a concert at the Murat theater on Thursday night of next week is regarded as a musical event of such unusual importance that action has been taken by the board of directors of the Merchants' Association, the president of the Chamber of Commerce and the mayor in recognition of its significance. This orchestra of 110 men is rated by experienced critics generally as one of the finest symphonic organizations of the world and its conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, is classed among the three or four greatest living conductors.

Paul Richey, president of the Chamber of Commerce, in a letter to members speaking of the importance of cultural development to a city, says: "One of the greatest movements of this sort for the development of our community is the bringing to this city of the great symphony orchestras, such as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is pre-eminently among the first organizations of the world. We hope that every member of the Indianapolis Chamber of Commerce, recognizing this important contribution to the growth of the community, will take it upon himself to do whatever possible toward increasing the appreciation of this work."

"To make a city complete," says the board of directors of the Merchants' Association, in a letter signed by Herman P. Lieber, president, "it requires not only stores and factories, schools and churches, parks and playgrounds, but it needs many unusual cultural activities. * * * We wish now to call your attention to another activity in this city, namely the concerts of Ona B. Talbot. For thirty years Mrs. Talbot has maintained concerts in this city which we believe any one will agree have been of the highest order. This year the first concert is by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on October 31. The Boston Orchestra is one of the two best orchestras of the world; every music lover ought to hear it."

"This is one of the greatest musical organizations in the world," says Mayor Slack in a letter, "and Indianapolis is fortunate in obtaining a concert at this time. As a matter of civic enterprise this orchestra should be patronized by the people of Indianapolis, and there should not be an empty seat in the house on that night."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

Mayor Calls on Public to Support Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert

Mayor L. Ert Slack yesterday urged public support of the Boston Symphony orchestra at its appearance at the Murat theater Oct. 31.

In a statement made public, Mayor Slack said:

"It is the particular business of the mayor of the city to aid in civic development and this does not merely include the physical development, but many times involves development along the lines of music, art, education and general public spirit. Our citizens now realize that great improvement in public spirit has arisen in the last two years, and we are all desirous of much more improvement, especially along the lines of music and other high-class entertainment.

"An opportunity is now given to patronize an outstanding musical event on the occasion of the Boston Symphony orchestra here at the Murat theater on the evening of Oct. 31. It is one of the greatest musical organizations in the world and Indianapolis is fortunate in obtaining a concert at this time. As a matter of civic enterprise this orchestra should be well patronized by the people of Indianapolis, and there should not be an empty seat in the house on that night."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR
OCT 19 1929

KOUSSEVITZKY QUALIFIES AS REGULAR "VOLGA BOATMAN"

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

Nothing, save his eloquent performances, reveals more clearly the artistic sincerity and devotion of Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra which plays at the Murat Oct. 31, than the circumstances of his career.

He first conducted as a boy of 12, when he led the local theater orchestra at his birthplace in the province of Tver, in northern Russia.

Attending the Conservatory at Moscow, he was required to study an instrument. He chose the double-bass, and the noted master, Ramboussec, was his teacher.

His proficiency upon this unusual instrument became so extraordinary that he toured all of Europe and became famous before he was even known as a conductor.

Organizes Orchestra.

Koussevitzky's abilities, indeed, were not of the sort to be so confined to a limited field, and from 1909 he devoted all his energies to conducting. He organized his own symphony orchestra in Moscow which soon came to be considered the finest in Russia.

CONCLUDED FROM PAGE 3.

He chartered a large steamer on the Volga river, and, taking his entire orchestra, together with soloists and a group of friends, made several voyages along the 2,500 miles of its basin. The party would port at each town along its bank, and announce a symphony concert in the local town hall. The country folk were of course astonished at this wonderful, new kind of music, but they were also both delighted and moved by it.

The revolution deprived Koussevitzky of his orchestra, but not of his energies. He became conductor of the Russian state orchestra (formerly the court orchestra).

Europe Hears Him.

It was in 1920 that Koussevitzky was first heard as a conductor in western Europe. He assembled an orchestra in Paris, and has since conducted annually his series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" at the opera house. He is also invited annually to conduct a series as guest of Sir Henry Wood's orchestra in London. Principally through these concerts, but also by virtue of operatic performances in Paris and elsewhere, Koussevitzky has come to be regarded as the most brilliant, inspired, and inspiring conductor in that part of the world.

Each spring, since Koussevitzy became the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1924, he has returned at the conclusion of his American season to conduct his Paris and London series, which the European public evidently hold to be an indispensable part of their musical life.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES
OCT 19 1929

eane.
ow, inasmuch in advance of mps for Coffin
rality nomina-
he was gatia

and prospective purch
sion here.

The federal governm
in the plant it is to bu

The various lessees install their own ma
power house.

Boston Symphony Will Be at the Murat Soon.

GREAT orchestra music, superb dancing and grand opera is the musical feast offered to Indiana and Indianapolis this season by the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts Enterprises.

Five evening attractions in the Murat, opening on Thursday evening, Oct. 31, with the world famous Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, are announced. The remaining four concerts on Monday evening will include the Isadora Duncan dancers, Nov. 25; La Argentina, Spain's famous dancer, Jan. 27; one performance of grand opera by the German Grand Opera Company, Feb. 24, and the Chicago Symphony orchestra, Frederick Stock conductor, March 3.

Individual tickets for any of the above concerts will be placed on sale Monday morning at the office of the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts Enterprises, Baldwin Piano Company.

For the first time in many years, to be exact, since February, 1912, the Boston Symphony orchestra is to visit Indianapolis, for a concert on Oct. 31. This orchestra, then reputed the greatest in the world, has in the intervening seventeen years added many glorious chapters to its illustrious history.

For five years the Boston Smyphony orchestra has been under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, the extraordinary Russian conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BRAZIL, INDIANA
TIMES & NEWS
OCT 19 1929

Ona B. Talbott Has Fine Program of Music Concerts

One of the finest series of concerts ever presented to music lovers of Indiana and Indianapolis is offered by the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts enterprises to be given in the Murat Theater. Five evening concerts to include the world famous Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor; October 31st; the Isadora Duncan dancers, twelve children of Isadora's School from Moscow, November 25; La Argentina, Spain's most famous dancer, January 27; one performance of grand opera, German Grand opera company and the Chicago Symphony orchestra, Frederick Stock, conductor, March 3rd.

Season tickets for the above sereies will be on sale until Monday morning, October 21st, when single tickets for the concerts will be on sale at the new office of the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts Enterprises, the Baldwin Piano company, 35 Monument Circle, Indianapolis. Prices of season tickets, $10.00, $15.00, $20,00, $22.00, $24.20 and $27.50; these prices include tax.

There is perhaps no other city in the country enjoying the advantage of the greatest in musical art that is not financially protected by a group of public spirited citizens with the exception of Indianapolis. Ona B. Talbot has for the past twenty-five years carried the financial burden alone, and it is not only a privilege but an obligation that now the people of Indiana show their appreciation by attending the concerts this season.

The superlative performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are indeed a thing at which to wonder. But just how and why this organization has come to be one of the very greatest in world leaves little room for speculation or debate. In the autumn of 1924, Serge Koussevitzky first crossed the Atlantic to become the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. During his five years as leader of the Boston Symphony expectations have more than been fufilled, qualities have been found in his leadership which are said to be without equal.

With such a combination of a great orchestra and a great leader it is not surprising that the Boston Symphony orchestra is regarded as one of the finest achievements in the musical performances of our day. There are waiting lists for every subscription series, and in the case of Indianapolis it was necessary to make the contract two years ago, with a guarantee of five thousand dollars.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

A standing audience and orchestra greeted Dr. Serge Koussevitzky Friday afternoon, [illegible] stepped upon the stage of Symphony hall, Boston, to begin the opening concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, in its forty-ninth season.

The Boston orchestra, directed by Koussevitzky, plays at the Murat in the first concert of the Talbot series Thursday evening, Oct. 31.

Personnel Constant.

In recording this event the Boston papers commented that "Not a single new face was to be seen in the orchestra of 110 musicians assembled upon the stage." The critics further attributed the marvelous finish and ensemble of the introductory performance to this constant personnel, and to the continuous unifying command of the Russian conductor, through his five seasons in America.

According to the Boston Globe of the following morning (Saturday, Oct. 12), "Dr." Koussevitsky comes back to an orchestra molded to his will and made into a superb musical instrument, and to an audience assembled in large measure by the power of his remarkable personality. The present position of the Boston symphony as an orchestra again unsurpassed in the world, has been won by his hard and intense effort."

Mary F. Watkins, in the Herald-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS
OCT 19 1929

148

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO BRING 110 MEN UNDER KOUSSEVITSKY

One hundred and ten musicians of exceptional quality headed by one of the world's greatest conductors Serge Koussevitsky will arrive in Indianapolis for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the last night of this month at the Murat theater.

Only the older generation of music lovers remembers the last appearance of the Boston Orchestra in Indianapolis. To any one familiar with American music affairs, past or present, its coming must be awaited with keen interest, for it has a long history of holding a foremost place among symphony orchestras. After a brief wartime lapse it has, to all accounts, been restored to as great a brilliancy as it ever attained in its long vareer if it has not reached an even higher standard under Koussevitsky, a musical genius.

What a luxury such a musical organization is, is indicated by remarks in the Boston Globe of October 11 in the course of a review of its opening concert of this season:

"Dr. Koussevitzky, returning for his sixth season as conductor of the Bosto Symphony, comes back to an orchestra he has molded to his will and made into a superb musical instrument. The present position of the Boston Symphony as an orchestra again unsurpassed in the world, has been won by his hard and intense effort. A financial statement from the trustees, inserted in yesterday's program, bore witness to the high cost of maintaining such an orchestra. The deficit on last season, with every ticket sold, was $145,493.68, of which sum $101,487.67 has thus far been contributed.

The Boston Orchestra's concert Thursday, October 31, will be the first of five events for the season under the direction of the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts Enterprises. Two dancing attractions, referred to elsewhere, will follow. The German Grand Opera Company, heard last season, will come for a single performance February 24 and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra will close the season March 3.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES
OCT 22

MUSIC EVENTS WIN PRAISE OF CIVIC LEADERS

Mayor, Merchants Group and C. of C. Indorse Talbot Concerts.

Cultural development of Indianapolis, particularly through the musical program billed for the city this winter, was praised today in official indorsements by Mayor L. Ert Slack, the Chamber of Commerce, and the Merchants Association of Indianapolis.

Each commended the presentation by the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts Enterprises, of the Boston Symphony orchestra in concert at the Murat temple, Oct. 31.

"It is the particular business of the mayor of the city to aid in civic development," said Mayor Slack. "This does not include merely the physical development, but many times involves development along lines of music, art, education, and general public spirit.

Symphony Orchestra Leads

"An opportunity is given now to patronize an outstanding musical event on the occasion of the Boston Symphony orchestra here. It is one of the greatest musical organizations in the world, and Indianapolis is fortunate in obtaining a concert at this time.

"As a matter of civic enterprise the concert should be well patronized by the people of Indianapolis," he concluded.

"Indianapolis is one of the first twenty cities in this country," Paul Q. Richey, president of the Chamber of Commerce declared. "If Indianapolis is to grow or even hold its place, it must have more than population.

Culture Is Essential

"It must have more than industrial development, financial development, or even more than schools and libraries can bring to it. It must have cultural development—only possible through bringing to its citizenry the best of art and music.

"One of the greatest movements of this sort is bringing to this city the Boston Symphony orchestra," he added.

"For thirty years Mrs. Talbot has maintained concerts in this city," said Herman P. Lieber, president of the Merchants Association. "She has the knowledge and talent for giving Indianapolis the best in music. The Boston orchestra is one of the two best in the world. Every music lover should hear it."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS
OCT 22

The coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Indianapolis for a concert at the Murat theater on Thursday night of next week is regarded as a musical event of such unusual importance that action has been taken by the board of directors of the Merchants' Association, the president of the Chamber of Commerce and the mayor in recognition of its significance. This orchestra of 110 men is rated by experienced critics generally as one of the finest symphonic organizations of the world and its conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, is classed among the three or four greatest living conductors.

Paul Richey, president of the Chamber of Commerce, in a letter to members speaking of the importance of cultural development to a city, says: "One of the greatest movements of this sort for the development of our community is the bringing to this city of the great symphony orchestras, such as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is pre-eminently among the first organizations of the world. We hope that every member of the Indianapolis Chamber of Commerce, recognizing this important contribution to the growth of the community, will take it upon himself to do whatever possible toward increasing the appreciation of this work."

"To make a city complete," says the board of directors of the Merchants' Association, in a letter signed by Herman P. Lieber, president, "it requires not only stores and factories, schools and churches, parks and playgrounds, but it needs many unusual cultural activities. * * * We wish now to call your attention to another activity in this city, namely the concerts of Ona B. Talbot. For thirty years Mrs. Talbot has maintained concerts in this city which we believe any one will agree have been of the highest order. This year the first concert is by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on October 31. The Boston Orchestra is one of the two best orchestras of the world; every music lover ought to hear it."

"This is one of the greatest musical organizations in the world," says Mayor Slack in a letter, "and Indianapolis is fortunate in obtaining a concert at this time. As a matter of civic enterprise this orchestra should be patronized by the people of Indianapolis, and there should not be an empty seat in the house on hat night."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

Mayor Calls on Public to Support Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert

Mayor L. Ert Slack yesterday urged public support of the Boston Symphony orchestra at its appearance at the Murat theater Oct. 31.

In a statement made public, Mayor Slack said:

"It is the particular business of the mayor of the city to aid in civic development and this does not merely include the physical development, but many times involves development along the lines of music, art, education and general public spirit. Our citizens now realize that great improvement in public spirit has arisen in the last two years, and we are all desirous of much more improvement, especially along the lines of music and other high-class entertainment.

"An opportunity is now given to patronize an outstanding musical event on the occasion of the Boston Symphony orchestra here at the Murat theater on the evening of Oct. 31. It is one of the greatest musical organizations in the world and Indianapolis is fortunate in obtaining a concert at this time. As a matter of civic enterprise this orchestra should be well patronized by the people of Indianapolis, and there should not be an empty seat in the house on that night."

7149

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS

OCT 26 1929

BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S COMING NEXT THURSDAY A HIGH PEAK OF SEASON

—Bachrach Photo.

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY.

Whether or not the Boston Symphony Orchestra is, as some contend, the greatest musical organization of its kind in the world, is one of those things that can never be positively settled. The fact that the question comes up, however, and is seriously discussed gives assurance that it is among the topmost of symphony orchestras. Much the same thing can be said of the rank of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, its leader for the last five years, among the world's conductors.

Keeping on the safe side of this matter of superlatives, it may be said as a simple matter of fact that the coming of the Boston Orchestra to Indianapolis for a concert next Thursday night, at the Murat, must be ranked among the high peaks of the season and, for that matter, of the city's musical history. Whatever its program, music lovers await it with interest, but, of course, they would like to know exactly what it is going to be and here it is:

"Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 10.....Handel.
Overture—Allegro; air; lento; allegro moderato; allegro.
"Nocturnes;" (a) "Nuages" (b) "Fetes" ..... Debussy.
Orchestral Excerpts from the Ballet "Daphnis et Chloe" (second suite) .....Ravel.
Lever du jour; pantomime; danse generale.
"Symphony No. 6 in B minor, 'Pathetic' Op. 74".....Tschaikowsky
Adagio; allegro non troppo; allegro con grazia; allegro molto vivace; finale; adagio lamentoso.

Several things of interest are told about the Boston Orchestra and Ravel's second "Daphnis et Chloe" suite, which is announced for performance in this city. When Maurice Ravel, its distinguished French composer, had only just landed in America last season, he went to Carnegie hall, New York, and sat in a box while Koussevitzky and his orchestra from Boston surprised him with the homage of a Ravel program. After this suite in [illegible] composer conductor and orchestra received an ovation. Koussevitzky, on first venturing to Chicago last season, also conducted this suite and again a distinctive impression was made.

"The first part of the program," wrote Herman Devries, Chicago critic, "was in truth so marvelous that when intermission came no one had anything left to give. The audience was bled dry of emotion and nerves and ecstacy. A reading of Ravel's 'Daphnis et Chloe' that would take columns to describe in its essence and the reaction upon its hearers—a color screen of gorgeous, heavenly blended hues, and contrasts, of never-heard sonorities, of fascinating harmony, of light and shade that held one breathless. The very silence of the audience was oppressive, a silence of rapt emotion, as though each human soul had forgotten the presence of its neighbor, and the ego was lost in this exhibition of matchless poetic beauty."

"Mr. Koussevitzky," said Olin Downes, in New York Times, November 25, 1927, "outdistanced any of his present colleagues and his orchestra gave an exhibition hardly to be surpassed in the 'Daphnis et Chloe' music of Ravel. We remember no such reading of this now familiar and popular music, none which drew such magic and such throbbing beauty from Ravel's orchestra, none which brought into existence, again as by magic, the most subtle and precise essence of the composer's thought. And here, of course, was special opportu[nity] orchestra, which Mr. K[oussevitzky] perfected, sensitized a[nd] remarkably in a few se[asons] itself in all its glory and glow of the string[s] the choirs, the depth a[nd] tone as a unit, and its changes of shading an[d] slightest behest of the [conductor] was conducting and [playing] ing at the highest pi[tch] wonder that the achie[vement] sevitzky and his play[ers] plause and even shouts of approval from the audience."

"Daphnis" is one of the works of art that owes its inspiration to the Ballet Russe of Diaghilev. The scenario was written by Michael Fokine of the Ballet Russe, and the poses throughout were planned after the painting and reliefs on Greek vases. Bakst designed the scenery and costumes. The first production was at the Chatelet in Paris, March 8, 1912. Daphnis was danced by Nijinsky, and Chloe by Karsavina. Pierre Monteaux conducted. Ravel divided the music of the ballet into two orchestral suites.

The Boston Orchestra is coming under the local management of the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts Enterprises, which will also bring the Isadora Duncan dancers, November 25; La Argentina, famous Spanish dancer, January 27; one performance of grand opera by the German Grand Opera Company, February 24, and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, Frederick Stock, conductor, March 3.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES

Orchestra Will Play Ravel Here

Boston Orchestra Will Be at the Murat Thursday.

THE musical awareness of Indiana is being demonstrated in the genuine interest being shown for the opening concert of the Ona B Talbot Fine Arts Enterprises on next Thursday evening at the Murat when the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra and its distinguished leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, will present a program of orchestral music.

The program follows.

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6 No. 10.....Handel
Overture—Allegro; Air; Lento; Allegro Moderato Allegro.....Handel
Nocturnes ..... Debussy
(a) Nuages.
(b) Fetes.
Orchestral Excerpts from the Ballet "Daphnis et Chloe" (second suite). Lever du Jour — Pantomime — Danse Generale.
Symphony No. 6 in B minor "Pathetic," Op. 74 ..... Taschaikowsky
(a) Adagio; Allegro non trippo.
(b) Allegro non grazia.
(c) Allegro molto vivace.
(d) Finale; Adagio lamentoso.

It is a matter of congratulation that the Indianapolis audience will have the opportunity of hearing the masterpiece of Ravel. When the Boston Symphony orchestra under the inpired leadership of Koussevitzky played this number in New York last season and again on their one week's tour, of which Chicago was one of the [illegible]

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

OCT 27 1929

HERE T[illegible]

2. Natalie Hall and John Moncrief in "Faust," which the American Opera company will present at the Murat theater tomorrow night.
3. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which comes to the Murat theater Thursday evening of this week.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

OCT 27 1929

Pathetic Symphony Chosen by Serge Koussevitzky for His Concert Here Thursday

BY CORBIN PATRICK.

THURSDAY NIGHT, when the Boston Symphony orchestra plays at the Murat theater, will be a memorable one for all who hear, from the grand dames who illuminate the boxes with the brilliance of their gowns to the struggling artist who perches, perhaps, on a seat high in the balcony.

The night can not be otherwise, with one of the world's greatest orchestras led by a conductor of genius bending its efforts to the interpretation of Tschaikowsky's masterpiece.

Serge Koussevitzky has selected as the program number for the local concert the symphony called the "Pathetic," the final work of the sensitive Russian, among the most eloquent compositions in all musical literature.

That need not be written for those who recall the performance of the New York Philharmonic, with the genial Willem Mengelberg wielding the baton, at the Murat two years ago when this symphony into which Tschaikowsky declared he had put his whole soul was last heard in Indianapolis.

Season's Formal Opening.

The complete program for the orchestra concert, which tradition has made the formal opening of the music season, has been arranged in this order:

"Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 10".....Handel
"Nocturnes" .....Debussy
(a) "Nuages"
(b) "Fetes"
Orchestral excerpts from the ballet "Daphnis et Chloe" (second suite) .....Ravel
"Symphony No. 6 in B Minor, Op. 74" .....Tschaikowsky

The number, Handel's concerto for the string orchestra, should introduce the Boston musicians at their best, revealing the full tonal beauties of Koussevitzky's proudest section. No orchestra, of course, is finer than its strings. The Debussy nocturnes are done in the impressionistic manner, rich in mood and subtle suggestion. The Ravel excerpts are remarkable for several woodwind passages of surpassing loveliness and close with a general dance that is said to be the most strongly rhythmed and tumultuous music yet written by this eminent Frenchman.

Enigma to Curious.

These will prepare the audience for the treat of the evening—the haunting vision that Tschaikowsky preserved. The Pathetic symphony is and ever will be an enigma to the curious. It has had almost as many interpretations as minds eager to learn its secret. Tschaikowsky, in fact, intended it should be a riddle to every one. "May they break their heads over it," he wrote. To some it is a picture of life as it seemed to the composer, dark and bitter sweet. Others feel that its significance is broader, national or historical rather than individual. There are countless variations. Regardless, the work is beautiful, and that is all we need to know.

In content, the sixth symphony is emotional, done in the autumnal mood, deeply moving. In content, it is rather unusual inasmuch as the finale is an adagio rather than the customary allegro. For those who would have further acquaintance with this composition before sitting down to the musical feast Thursday night, an explanatory program will be broadcast over WFBM from 6 to 6:30 o'clock this evening. Mrs. Lenora Coffin will lecture, and her words will be illustrated at the piano by Boris Rosenfield, young artist of the faculty of the Jordan conservatory of music. Ona B. Talbot will speak on "What Music Means in a Community."

will be given twice a month. In the past they have been an important feature of the local season, and they will be indispensable now that the Sunday afternoon recitals at the Murat are denied us. The court usually was filled to overflowing in the old days, and standing room doubtlessly will be more at a premium than ever when the present series begins.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS
OCT 26 1929

BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S COMING NEXT THURSDAY A HIGH PEAK OF SEASON

—Bachrach Photo.

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY.

Whether or not the Boston Symphony Orchestra is, as some contend, the greatest musical organization of its kind in the world, is one of those things that can never be positively settled. The fact that the question comes up, however, and is seriously discussed gives assurance that it is among the topmost of symphony orchestras. Much the same thing can be said of the rank of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, its leader for the last five years, among the world's conductors.

Keeping on the safe side of this matter of superlatives, it may be said as a simple matter of fact that the coming of the Boston Orchestra to Indianapolis for a concert next Thursday night, at the Murat, must be ranked among the high peaks of the season and, for that matter, of the city's musical history. Whatever its program, music lovers await it with interest, but, of course, they would like to know exactly what it is going to be and here it is:

"Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 10.....Handel.
Overture—Allegro; air; lento; allegro moderato; allegro.
"Nocturnes;" (a) "Nuages" (b) "Fetes" .....Debussy.
Orchestral Excerpts from the Ballet "Daphnis et Chloe" (second suite) .....Ravel.
Lever du jour; pantomime; danse generale.
"Symphony No. 6 in B minor, 'Pathetic' Op. 74".....Tschaikowsky
Adagio; allegro non troppo; allegro con grazia; allegro molto vivace; finale; adagio lamentoso.

Several things of interest are told about the Boston Orchestra and Ravel's second "Daphnis et Chloe" suite, which is announced for performance in this city. When Maurice Ravel, its distinguished French composer, had only just landed in America last season, he went to Carnegie hall, New York, and sat in a box while Koussevitzky and his orchestra from Boston surprised him with the homage of a Ravel program. After this suite in [illegible] composer, conductor and orchestra received an ovation. Koussevitzky, on first venturing to Chicago last season, also conducted this suite and again a distinctive impression was made.

"The first part of the program," wrote Herman Devries, Chicago critic, "was in truth so marvelous that when intermission came no one had anything left to give. The audience was bled dry of emotion and nerves and ecstacy. A reading of Ravel's 'Daphnis et Chloe' that would take columns to describe in its essence and the reaction upon its hearers—a color screen of gorgeous, heavenly blended hues, and contrasts, of never-heard sonorities, of fascinating harmony, of light and shade that held one breathless. The very silence of the audience was oppressive, a silence of rapt emotion, as though each human soul had forgotten the presence of its neighbor, and the ego was lost in this exhibition of matchless poetic beauty."

"Mr. Koussevitzky," said Olin Downes, in New York Times, November 25, 1927, "outdistanced any of his present colleagues and his orchestra gave an exhibition hardly to be surpassed in the 'Daphnis et Chloe' music of Ravel. We remember no such reading of this now familiar and popular music, none which drew such magic and such throbbing beauty from Ravel's orchestra, none which brought into existence, again as by magic, the most subtle and precise essence of the composer's thought. And here, of course, was special opportunity for the orchestra, which Mr. Koussevitzky has perfected, sensitized and energized so remarkably in a few seasons, to show itself in all its glory—the shimmer and glow of the strings, the fusion of the choirs, the depth and body of the tone as a unit, and its instantaneous changes of shading and color at the slightest behest of the leader. This was conducting and orchestral playing at the highest pitch, and it is no wonder that the achievement of Koussevitzky and his players brought applause and even shouts of approval from the audience."

"Daphnis" is one of the works of art that owes its inspiration to the Ballet Russe of Diaghilev. The scenario was written by Michael Fokine of the Ballet Russe, and the poses throughout were planned after the painting and reliefs on Greek vases. Bakst designed the scenery and costumes. The first production was at the Chatelet in Paris, March 8, 1912. Daphnis was danced by Nijinsky, and Chloe by Karsavina. Pierre Monteaux conducted. Ravel divided the music of the ballet into two orchestral suites.

The Boston Orchestra is coming under the local management of the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts Enterprises, which will also bring the Isadora Duncan dancers, November 25; La Argentina, famous Spanish dancer, January 27; one performance of grand opera by the German Grand Opera Company, February 24, and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, Frederick Stock, conductor, March 3.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES

Orchestra Will Play Ravel Here

Boston Orchestra Will Be at the Murat Thursday.

THE musical awareness of Indiana is being demonstrated in the genuine interest being shown for the opening concert of the Ona B Talbot Fine Arts Enterprises on next Thursday evening at the Murat when the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra and its distinguished leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will present a program of orchestral music.

The program follows.

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6 No. 10.....Handel
Overture—Allegro; Air; Lento; Allegro Moderato Allegro.....Handel
Nocturnes ..... Debussy
(a) Nuages.
(b) Fetes.
Orchestral Excerpts from the Ballet "Daphnis et Chloe" (second suite). Lever du Jour — Pantomime — Danse Generale.
Symphony No. 6 in B minor "Pathetic," Op. 74 ..... Taschaikowsky
(a) Adagio; Allegro non trippo.
(b) Allegro non grazia.
(c) Allegro molto vivace.
(d) Finale; Adagio lamentoso.

It is a matter of congratulation that the Indianapolis audience will have the opportunity of hearing the masterpiece of Ravel. When the Boston Symphony orchestra under the inpired leadership of Koussevitzky played this number in New York last season and again on their one week's tour, of which Chicago was one of the cities visited, the music critics exhausted all their choicest adjectives in describing the beauty and the thrill experienced by all hearers at the interpretation of the Ravel composition by Koussevitzky.

The four remaining concerts will include the Duncan Dancers, Nov. 25; La Argentina, famous Spanish dancer, Jan. 27; one performance of Grand Opera, German Opera Company, Feb. 24, and the Chicago Symphony orchestra, March 3.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

Pathetic Symphony Chosen by Serge Koussevitzky for His Concert Here Thursday

BY CORBIN PATRICK.

THURSDAY NIGHT, when the Boston Symphony orchestra plays at the Murat theater, will be a memorable one for all who hear, from the grand dames who illuminate the boxes with the brilliance of their gowns to the struggling artist who perches, perhaps, on a seat high in the balcony.

The night can not be otherwise, with one of the world's greatest orchestras led by a conductor of genius bending its efforts to the interpretation of Tschaikowsky's masterpiece.

Serge Koussevitzky has selected as the program number for the local concert the symphony called the "Pathetic," the final work of the sensitive Russian, among the most eloquent compositions in all musical literature.

That need not be written for those who recall the performance of the New York Philharmonic, with the genial Willem Mengelberg wielding the baton, at the Murat two years ago when this symphony into which Tschaikowsky declared he had put his whole soul was last heard in Indianapolis.

Season's Formal Opening.

The complete program for the orchestra concert, which tradition has made the formal opening of the music season, has been arranged in this order:

"Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 10"....Handel
"Nocturnes" .....Debussy
(a) "Nuages"
(b) "Fetes"
Orchestral excerpts from the ballet "Daphnis et Chloe" (second suite) .....Ravel
"Symphony No. 6 in B Minor, Op. 74" .....Tschaikowsky

The number, Handel's concerto for the string orchestra, should introduce the Boston musicians at their best, revealing the full tonal beauties of Koussevitzky's proudest section. No orchestra, of course, is finer than its strings. The Debussy nocturnes are done in the impressionistic manner, rich in mood and subtle suggestion. The Ravel excerpts are remarkable for several woodwind passages of surpassing loveliness and close with a general dance that is said to be the most strongly rhythmed and tumultuous music yet written by this eminent Frenchman.

Enigma to Curious.

These will prepare the audience for the treat of the evening—the haunting vision that Tschaikowsky preserved. The Pathetic symphony is and ever will be an enigma to the curious. It has had almost as many interpretations as minds eager to learn its secret. Tschaikowsky, in fact, intended it should be a riddle to every one. "May they break their heads over it," he wrote. To some it is a picture of life as it seemed to the composer, dark and bitter sweet. Others feel that its significance is broader, national or historical rather than individual. There are countless variations. Regardless, the work is beautiful, and that is all we need to know.

In content, the sixth symphony is emotional, done in the autumnal mood, deeply moving. In content, it is rather unusual inasmuch as the finale is an adagio rather than the customary allegro. For those who would have further acquaintance with this composition before sitting down to the musical feast Thursday night, an explanatory program will be broadcast over WFBM from 6 to 6:30 o'clock this evening. Mrs. Lenora Coffin will lecture, and her words will be illustrated at the piano by Boris Rosenfield, young artist of the faculty of the Jordan conservatory of music. Ona B. Talbot will speak on "What Music Means in a Community."

will be given twice a month. In the past they have been an important feature of the local season, and they will be indispensable now that the Sunday afternoon recitals at the Murat are denied us. The court usually was filled to overflowing in the old days, and standing room doubtlessly will be more at a premium than ever when the present series begins.

[illegible] CORES
[illegible] CELLO IN [illegible] 'S ARK"
[illegible] ER AND [illegible] NTAL

ture, "The Time, the Place and the Girl," starring Betty Compson.

The picture is of a wise-cracking college football player, who later makes a success as a bond salesman.

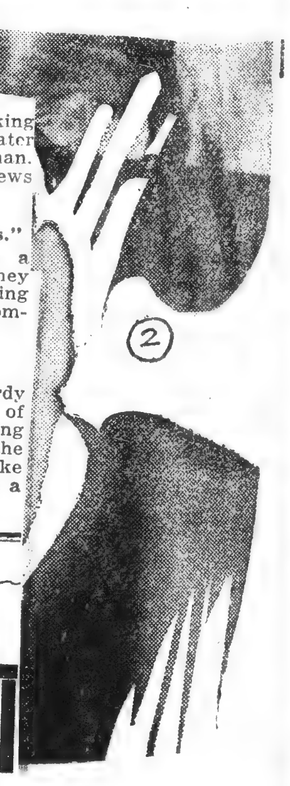
There will be a comedy and news reel.

BELMONT—"Smiling Irish Eyes."

Belmont moviegoers will get a treat today and tomorrow when they see "Smiling Irish Eyes," featuring Colleen Moore. A comedy will complete the bill.

ADD TWO TO CAST.

With the signing of Sam Hardy and George Rigas to the cast of "acquitted," the Columbia all-talking melodrama of the underworld, the company went on location to make the thrill sequences which provide a sensational climax for the picture.



MOTION PICTURE THEATERS.

ISIS

NOW SHOWING

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR
OCT 28 1929

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Open Talbot Series of Concerts Thursday

Serge Koussevitzky, famous Russian musician and conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who will open the twenty-fourth annual season of concerts of the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts Enterprises in the Murat theater Thursday night, possesses a complete faith that every one, every one in the world appreciates good music.

"The man sings, he sings songs to himself—why should he not love music?" asks Dr. Koussevitzky, a remark that fills the American onlooker with the benevolent affection given to dear old grandma when she says, "There is good in every one."

Russians Are Different.

However Russians, it appears, are different, possibly because they have no shoals of little songs about a "Cottage Small by a Waterfall" or "She Was More Than a Mother to Me." In Russia Koussevitzky's orchestra played in Moscow and in Petrograd and the people came from all the country around to hear. Every Sunday he gave a concert for the workers. They crowded the hall. And his joy was in the thought that because a symphony orchestra is a grand thing, every one, rich and poor, were able to enjoy this beauty!

From all reports, Indiana music lovers are recognizing the rare opportunity of hearing a concert played by the Boston Symphony orchestra directed by Serge Koussevitzky and will be present in the Murat theater on Thursday evening to greet the distinguished visitor and his superb organization.

More than a hundred students and teachers from Indiana university, fifty representatives from Tudor Hall School for Girls, as many more from DePauw university and large delegations from Richmond and Earlham, as well as members of the different orchestras throughout the state, are planning to come for the concert.

Capacity Crowd Expected.

All conditions seem ideal for Koussevitzky to liberate his extraordinary powers before a capacity audience in the Murat theater on Thursday evening.

Even before Koussevitzky first arrived in America, all seats for the Boston Symphony concerts were taken for the season. There are now waiting lists of prospective subscribers in New York and in Boston as well, even though concerts in the orchestras' own locality have been increased to five series, or more than seventy concerts. This exacting schedule makes a visit to a city as far west as this necessarily infrequent. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will visit the following cities included in this extra-schedule tour: Chicago, Indianapolis, Minneapolis, Buffalo and Pittsburgh.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR
OCT 29

Serge Koussevitzky and Orchestra to Give Notable Program Thursday

The Indianapolis musical season under the direction of the Ona B. Talbot fine arts enterprises will have an auspicious opening in the Murat theater at 8:15 o'clock Thursday night when the Boston Symphony orchestra of 110 men and its distinguished leader Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will present a notable orchestral program to include the "Grosso Concerto," Handel; "Nuage" and "Fetes," Debussy; Second Suite of "Daphnid et Chloe," Ballet, Ravel; closing with the famous "Pathetic Symphony" of Tschaikowsky.

Seventeen years have gone by since the Boston Symphony orchestra last visited Indianapolis. The return of the eminent organization will be doubly interesting, since Serge Koussevitzky will make his introductory bow to an Indiana audience. This orchestra, now in its forty-ninth year, last visited Indianapolis Feb. 1, 1912.

Since that time a surpassingly brilliant era has been added to the history of the illustrious organization whose name has so long been associated with the utmost perfection in symphonic performance.

Comes to U. S. in 1929.

It was in the autumn of 1924 that Serge Koussevitzky came from Europe to lead the orchestra. The orchestra which he had assembled in Russia before the war, and his concerts in Moscow and Petrograd were still famous, though no longer existing. Koussevitzky was also well known by the repute of the Volga expeditions, when he journeyed 2,500 miles in a specially chartered steamer, carrying symphony concerts into the great interior of Russia. It is characteristic of Kousevitzky thus to spread the gospel of music at immense effort and expense.

In America Koussevitzky came to what was undoubtedly the finest orchestra he had ever had to do his bidding. That such an organiation and such a leader should come together for a single purpose led the public to expect great results; yet the most sanguine expectations have been surpassed in the last five seasons.

The orchestra, reaffirming its traditional fame, responds as a rare, single instrument to the slightest gesture of the commander.

Says U. S. Audiences Responsive.

Asked what he thought of his audiences in America, Koussevitzky said with real enthusiasm: "I have come in contact with a number of American audiences, not only in Boston and New York, but further afield. The audiences everywhere I have found particularly responsive, their reactions interesting. The only measure of success in a symphony concert is a close sympathy and understanding between orchestra and audience.

"I usually find there is an intimate contact, a close 'rapport.' The score I am leading possesses me—I feel its moods and its beauties most vividly. When the audience responds with me to the music, I can perceive this response, almost intuitively. To me this is the ultimate achievement; it is the one justification of the painstaking efforts of orchestra and conductor in preparation and in performance."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS
OCT 29

English Critic Describes Boston Symphony Leader

Ernest Newman, one of the foremost music critics of England, has given high praise to Serge Koussevitsky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will come with the orchestra for a concert at the Murat theater Thursday night, opening the Ona B. Talbot season.

"America will find Koussevitzky's musicianship and his orchestral technique equal to any demands that are likely to made on them," wrote Newman, when Koussevitzky came to America five years ago. "Opinions about him will differ. I can only speak of the impression he has made on myself after experience of him in music of all schools and all orders. He has volcanic temperament, but I have never yet known it to run away with him. On the contrary, it is precisely when his temperament is at boiling point that his hand on the regulator is steadiest and surest. He takes an enormous amount out of himself when he conducts, and the wonder to me always is how he manages to get through the quantity of work he does, and to keep his nerves so steady and his head so cool through it all.

"Richard Strauss once astonished the world by saying apropos of 'Tristan', 'Believe me, the brain that could pour out that passionate music must have been as cold as ice.' What seems like paradox in this, however, is no more than sober truth. The more an artist is on fire, the cooler have to be the head and hand that direct the fire. Koussevitzky has this central ice in an extraordinary degree. I believe it would hardly be possible to raise some works to a higher pitch of nervous incandescence than he does; but the nervousness never gets out of hand. It is Koussevitzky's servant, not his master. The excitement is always perfectly under control; one great plastic line runs round and through the work."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS
OCT 29

BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S VISIT

Those rare occasions on which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has visited Indianapolis have always been notable events, whose memory has been long cherished by the city's music lovers, for the Boston orchestra has had a long history of excellence. Now, after an interval of nearly a score of years, it will again be heard in Indianapolis Thursday night with a reputation as brilliant as at any time in its long career, if not even more brilliant than ever before. Its 110 men are under a leader of whose genius much has been written with enthusiasm by critics noted for their exacting standards and not easily moved to superlatives. Serge Koussevitsky is now in his sixth year of constant control of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, without its undergoing intervals of guest conductorship that have unsteadied the experience of other great American orchestras.

Koussevitsky is constantly being compared as a musical genius with Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, and Arturo Toscaninni, who has for part of each season for several years taken charge of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra. Critics differ in their detailed preferences as to these three men, but agree in placing them in the topmost rank, each with phases in which he is preferred as supreme. They are all tense, passionate artists. Koussevitsky is said to possess a coolness of judgment along with his internal fire that controls and gives effect to his intensity.

Often as Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" Symphony, the main number on Thursday's program, has been heard, it should be interesting to hear this great Russian work again as interpreted by a great Russian conductor. Such leaders as Stokowski, Toscaninni and Koussevitsky can always be counted on for fresh coinage of old musical metal, so that, what with the satisfactions to sophisticated music lovers this ability gives, together with the general popularity this symphony has, there should be a pretty large measure of satisfaction all round.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS
OCT 31

Capacity Audience Likely for Boston Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 110 men, with its celebrated leader Serge Koussevitsky, was due to arrive in Indianapolis Thursday afternoon for its concert at 8:15 at the Murat theater, opening the season of the Ona B. Tablot Fine Arts Enterprises. The orchestra came directly from Minneapolis where it had presented a concert for the dedication of the new music hall of the Minnesota University.

It was stated by the local management that no one arriving at the theater after the beginning of the program would be ushered to his seat during the playing of any number.

An audience testing the theater's ful seating capacity was indicated by the advance sale. Following is the program:

Gross Concerto for Strings .....Handel
Two Nocturnes—
"Nuage" .....Debussy
"Fetes" .....Debussy
Second suite from "Daphinis et Chloe"
..... Ravel
Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic".Tschaikowsky

The concert given by the Boston orchestra in Chicago on Tuesday evening was said by the critics there to have been even greater than one it gave last year, which they then thought could not be excelled. Particular praise was given for the interpretative genius of Koussevitzky in his rendition of the Tschaikowsky "Pathetic."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR
OCT 30 1929

150

Boston Symphony, With Koussevitzky Directing, to Be at Murat Tomorrow

Tomorrow evening in the Murat theater the music-loving public of Indianapolis and Indiana is promised a treat in the presentation of a notable orchestral program by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky directing. When Indianapolis last was visited by the Boston Symphony, seventeen years ago, it was then reputed to be the greatest in the world. During the intervening years it has added many glorious chapters to its illustrious history.

Sir George Henschel was the first conductor of the Boston Symphony, Wilhelm Gericke the second. Then came Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur, Carl Muck, Max Fiedler, Henri Rabaud, Pierre Monteux and, five years ago, came Serge Koussevitzky, the extraordinary Russian conductor whose genius has found a wider range, a more perfectly responsive instrument than ever before.

A journey so far westward by the orchestra must of necessity be seldom indeed. The orchestra's schedule of concerts is almost entirely filled by the five series in greater Boston, one in Providence and two in New York. Each of these is subscribed in advance to the last seat, with waiting lists from year to year.

This, therefore, is the extent of its itinerary, save for a week's journey westward in the autumn. The present week's tour includes Minneapolis, Chicago, Indianapolis, Pittsburgh and Buffalo.

The great composers represented on the program tomorrow evening are Handel, Debussy, Ravel and Tschaikowsky. What is probably the most loved of all symphonic compositions is the "Pathetic" Symphony of Tschaikowsky. By many it is believed to be the document of his own life so filled with suffering and privation. Koussevitzky's interpretation of this symphony is said to be superb. His innate Russian understanding makes his reading of the score a rare musical treat.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES
OCT 31

KOUSSEVITZKY WILL CONDUCT TONIGHT

Famous Boston Symphony Will Open Orchestral Season of Ona B. Talbot at the Murat Theater.

A BRILLIANT assemblage will greet Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the famous Boston Symphony orchestra tonight at the Murat when the opening concert of the twenty-fourth annual season of the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts Enterprises will be inaugurated.

The audience is requested to be in their respective chairs before 8:15 o'clock the time of the concert, as no one will be ushered to seats after the concert begins, until intermission.

Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra of 110 men will arrive in Indianapolis this afternoon from Minneapolis where they played a concert last night.

Their one week tour has been one of sensational success, starting in Buffalo last Monday evening; Tuesday, Chicago; Wednesday, Minneapolis; Thursday, Indianapolis; Friday, Pittsburgh and then their return to Boston.

The following is the complete program for tonight's concert:

Grosso Concerto (string orchestra) .Handel
"Nuage," "Fetes" (two nocturnes..Debussy
Second Suite "Daphis et Chloe'....Ravel
Pathetic Symphony No. 6...Tschaikowsky

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEWS
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NOV 1 1929

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS UNDER BATON OF A GENIUS

Serge Koussevitsky, With Quietly Masterful Methods, Summons Magnificent Music From This Famous Organization in Concert at the Murat.

[By Walter Whitworth]

Patrons of the concert hall who went to the Murat Thursday evening had the privilege of seeing a man who is ranked, by leading critics, as one of the three greatest orchestra conductors in the world, Serge Roussevitsky, and the further privilege of hearing one of the four great orchestras of America, the Boston Symphony, which opened the music season of the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts Enterprises.

There is reason for including Koussevitsky among the geniuses of the baton. He is a titan. His command of his men is superb, and his command is apparently effortless. Chary of gesture, not given to personal display, he controls his orchestra so consummately that it might be one man, rather than 100 men. It is, indeed, a closely knit unit. Heedful of its leader's sudden, incisive swing of the arm, a gesture that has tremendous vigor and authority, it sweeps to a climax of brilliance and beauty. Heedful, also, of those cupped palms, magnetic and demanding, it rises from pianissimo to fortissimo as the hands rise in the air. Immediately, too, it softens to an almost inaudible murmur when the director wills it. Few orchestras are so pliable, so ready in response, so right in following the baton.

If music ever was a "heavenly maid," it was such a one Thursday. And one heard all kinds of symphonic music. It is, perhaps, a long journey from a Handel Concerto Grosso for string orchestra to a Tschaikowsky symphony—the sixth, commonly called "Pathetic"—especially when one pauses by Debussy and Ravel on the way, but the Boston orchestra made the journey one of inestimable delight, of ever-varying splendor, of delicacy and of magnificence.

The Handel Concerto was a thing of classical beauty. It had purity of form and outline. Its flawless content was entrancingly revealed. The music shimmered, danced with lightness and subtlety. It was molded plastically and with finest nuance.

Then, in contrast, came two Debussy nocturnes: "Nuages" and "Fetes." Debussy's music is vaguer in outline, more tenuous, etiolated. It is music heard, as it were, through a soft haze, never sharp in outline, although not wholly lacking virility. It is like a painting in pastel shades, a painting free from the angles and planes, and the grotesquely impinging colors of extreme modernism, but a modern painting, for all that. It is, especially in "Nuages," quietly impressionistic, creating its own mood with the simplest of materials. It is never robust; but, on the other hand, it is never submissive. It asserts itself so skillfully, that one falls under its spell with ease.

Excerpts from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe," closed the first half of the program. This, again, is rather impressionistic in manner, although, as it is dance music, it has body and vigor. Written in 1911, before Ravel's inspiration began to falter, before he wrote highly formalized and logical works, it seems almost old-fashioned, with its melody, its color, its life and its touch of genius. Koussevitsky's orchestra gave it a dazzling performance.

The symphony closed the program. Tschaikowsky's work is familiar enough to every one, so familar, in fact, that it is derisively called a "war horse," but, Thursday evening, it seemed like a new symphony. One understood Lawrence Gilman's reason for calling it a "lonely masterpiece." Perhaps the second movement—that curious excursion into the realm of five-four time—and the third movement are beginning to "date," but the first and last movements are still ineffably majestic. Thursday night they had a cosmic significance. The outpouring of grief in the music seemed less personal than usual: seemed less the grief of a tortured man than the grief of tortured humanity, realizing, in an intense crisis, the sorrows of its own unhappy existence. It was a marvelous interpretation, an unforgettable half hour.

All this music, of course, is familiar, done to death, as the expression has it, Yet Koussevitsky made his listeners feel that it had been "done to death" only because inferior conductors had been content to let the music take its course, had not, or could not, infuse it with life, with meaning. Genius says something to every one, and it may not always be the same thing, but genius, speaking to genius, is doubly revealed. No longer is the great composer hackneyed, for, finding a great interpreter, he proves that he is constantly disclosing new aspects.

Koussevitsky disclosed many in his concert. Finely and completely equipped, he has no need to indulge in display. The music he evokes speaks for him, stands side by side with him, his peer, not his fawning flatterer. His own greatness is reason enough for his unassuming manner on the conductor's stand. He understands his music and his men understand him. The result is magnificent.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES
NOV 1 - 1929

Concerning a Symphony

BY WALTER D. HICKMAN.

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and his Boston Symphony orchestra will be remembered in concert last night for the playing of two nocturnes by Debussy and orchestral excerpts from Ravel's modern ballett, "Daphnis et Chloe."

Koussevitzky and his men seem to revel in the lighter moments. It seems one gets nearer the soul of certain composers when in a more quiet mood.

And so with the members of this orchestra, they seem to weave a beautiful and melodious fabric in the charming and sweet nocturne, "Nuages," and were equally marvelous in the rather more robust nocturnem "Fetes," by Debussy.

Ravel may be just noise to some people, but the ballet played last night had life, color and even charm. There were modern musical crashes and all that but it was so intelligently played by the orchestra that it was not a freak or just a novelty.

The symphony last night for the Boston Symphony was Symphony No. 6 in M minor, "Pathetic," Op. 74. The first and fourth movements have always been my favorites and it is my opinion that the genius of the conductor was best reflected in these two movements.

The Boston Symphony is just about as perfect a playing organization as there is in this country. Its conductor, Dr. Koussevitzky, brings no fireworks to the conducting stand, but a great knowledge and a consumate mastery of every mood of a composition and he passes that on to his men.

He is more like a learned professor on his conducting stand that some of these long-haired and temperamental babies who pose as would-be conductors.

Here is a great musical brain. Here is a master of the baton. He is sure of his men, sure of himself and equally sure of the results. In fact, the great, sincere and wholesome doctor of an orchestra.

I will not discuss the opening number because the holiday crowd made me late with hundreds of others. I hope the next time that Ona B. Talbot opens her season of great orchestral music at the Murat that she will not choose Halloween night as the night.

I am sure that because hundreds of people were late that it did have a rather disturbing effect upon all present, even those who arrived on time and were seated.

Again we have had a great experience in orchestral music. Again we say, it seems that only Ona B. Talbot can take the risk in spending so much money in bringing such a great organization to this city.

Every seat should have been sold. But they were not. The house should have been standing room only, although a large audience was present.

The movement should start now—Capacity and standing room only for the remaining orchestra concerts that Mrs. Talbot will bring here.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS
NOV 1 - 1929

Lovely Costumes Seen in Large Audience for Opening Symphony Concert of Season

The opening symphony concert, one of the social events of the winter season in Indianapolis, was attended Thursday evening by a large audience. The Boston Symphony, brought to Indianapolis by Mrs. Ona B. Talbot drew an enthusiastic audience of those interested in music.

Many box parties were given by widely-known Indianapolis persons and the lovely evening wraps and gowns made a beautiful scene. The first symphony concert takes the place in Indianpolis of the opening of the opera in New York and Chicago. During the intermision groups promenaded in the foyer and the smart dress and jewels made an imposing spectacle.

There were many evening gowns in the new styles with long skirts and some fashioned with the princess line, ermine evening wraps or ones of brocade or velvet trimmed in fur.

Among those who entertained with box parties was Mrs. Hugh McGowan, who had with her Mrs. Harold Bolton, London, and Mrs. Harry Schlotzhauer, her daughters. Others in her box were Mrs. Henry Talbot, Mrs. Samuel Reid, Mrs. Francis O. Dorsey and Mr. Schlotzhauer. Mrs. McGowan, who has returned to Indianapolis for the winter, wore a gown of black with a brocaded evening wrap. Mrs. Bolton wore a smart gown of blue velvet.

Others in the audience were Mr. and Mrs. Charles L. Nicholson, who wore white chiffon velvet trimmed with bands of rhinestones; Mr. and Mrs. Nicholson Noyes, Mrs. Benjamin D. Hitz, Mrs. Joseph Daniels, Mrs. Charles Lathan, Mrs. Noble Dean, who wore black tulle over satin; Miss Adele Pantzer, Mrs. John Eaglesfield, Mrs. Pauline M. Haueisen, Mr. and Mrs. James Smith Watson, Miss Elizabeth Watson, Mr. and Mrs. Alex Holliday, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic M. Ayres and Mr. and Mrs. Rudolph Haerle.

Others seen promenading during the intermission were Mrs. Russel Fortune in a beautiful gown of brown lace, Mrs. Herbert Woollen in black taffeta with touches of red, Miss Genevieve Pickrell, Mrs. Henley Holliday in a smart gown of purple velvet simply made on long lines, Mrs. Robert Milliken, Mr. and Mrs. William Fisk Landers, Mrs. William Rockwood, Mrs. Albert Cole in black chiffon and Mrs. James Fesler.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS
NOV 1 - 1929

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS UNDER BATON OF A GENIUS

Serge Koussevitsky, With Quietly Masterful Methods, Summons Magnificent Music From This Famous Organization in Concert at the Murat.

[By Walter Whitworth]

Patrons of the concert hall who went to the Murat Thursday evening had the privilege of seeing a man who is ranked, by leading critics, as one of the three greatest orchestra conductors in the world, Serge Roussevitsky, and the further privilege of hearing one of the four great orchestras of America, the Boston Symphony, which opened the music season of the Ona B. Talbot Fine Arts Enterprises.

There is reason for including Koussevitsky among the geniuses of the baton. He is a titan. His command of his men is superb, and his command is apparently effortless. Chary of gesture, not given to personal display, he controls his orchestra so consummately that it might be one man, rather than 100 men. It is, indeed, a closely knit unit. Heedful of its leader's sudden, incisive swing of the arm, a gesture that has tremendous vigor and authority, it sweeps to a climax of brilliance and beauty. Heedful, also, of those cupped palms, magnetic and demanding, it rises from pianissimo to fortissimo as the hands rise in the air. Immediately, too, it softens to an almost inaudible murmur when the director wills it. Few orchestras are so pliable, so ready in response, so right in following the baton.

If music ever was a "heavenly maid," it was such a one Thursday. And one heard all kinds of symphonic music. It is, perhaps, a long journey from a Handel Concerto Grosso for string orchestra to a Tschaikowsky symphony—the sixth, commonly called "Pathetic"—especially when one pauses by Debussy and Ravel on the way, but the Boston orchestra made the journey one of inestimable delight, of ever-varying splendor, of delicacy and of magnificence.

The Handel Concerto was a thing of classical beauty. It had purity of form and outline. Its flawless content was entrancingly revealed. The music shimmered, danced with lightness and subtlety. It was molded plastically and with finest nuance.

Then, in contrast, came two Debussy nocturnes: "Nuages" and "Fetes." Debussy's music is vaguer in outline, more tenuous, etiolated. It is music heard, as it were, through a soft haze, never sharp in outline, although not wholly lacking virility. It is like a painting in pastel shades, a painting free from the angles and planes, and the grotesquely impinging colors of extreme modernism, but a modern painting, for all that. It is, especially in "Nuages," quietly impressionistic, creating its own mood with the simplest of materials. It is never robust; but, on the other hand, it is never submissive. It asserts itself so skillfully, that one falls under its spell with ease.

Excerpts from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe," closed the first half of the program. This, again, is rather impressionistic in manner, although, as it is dance music, it has body and vigor. Written in 1911, before Ravel's inspiration began to falter, before he wrote highly formalized and logical works, it seems almost old-fashioned, with its melody, its color, its life and its touch of genius. Koussevitsky's orchestra gave it a dazzling performance.

The symphony closed the program. Tschaikowsky's work is familiar enough to every one, so familar, in fact, that it is derisively called a "war horse," but, Thursday evening, it seemed like a new symphony. One understood Lawrence Gilman's reason for calling it a "lonely masterpiece." Perhaps the second movement—that curious excursion into the realm of five-four time—and the third movement are beginning to "date," but the first and last movements are still ineffably majestic. Thursday night they had a cosmic significance. The outpouring of grief in the music seemed less personal than usual seemed less the grief of a tortured man than the grief of tortured humanity, realizing, in an intense crisis the sorrows of its own unhappy existence. It was a marvelous interpretation, an unforgettable half hour.

All this music, of course, is familiar done to death, as the expression has it, Yet Koussevitsky made his listeners feel that it had been "done to death" only because inferior conductors had been content to let the music take its course, had not, or could not, infuse it with life, with meaning. Genius says something to every one and it may not always be the same thing, but genius, speaking to genius is doubly revealed. No longer is the great composer hackneyed, for, finding a great interpreter, he proves that he is constantly disclosing new aspects.

Koussevitsky disclosed many in his concert. Finely and completely equipped, he has no need to indulge in display. The music he evokes speaks for him, stands side by side with him, his peer, not his fawning flatterer. His own greatness is reason enough for his unassuming manner on the conductor's stand. He understands his music and his men understand him. The result is magnificent.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL

U. TO DEDICATE NEW AUDITORIUM OCT. 22 TO NOV. 15

Alumni and State Will Take Part in Acceptance Ceremonies

2 FAMOUS SYMPHONIES BOOKED FOR CONCERTS

Verbrugghen Arranging Opening Program to Carry Out Festival Spirit

Dedication exercises for the new Cyrus Northrop Memorial Auditorium at the University of Minnesota will start October 22 and continue through November 15, it was announced today.

The dedication program will include the appearances of two of the country's leading musical organizations, the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra on October 22 and the Boston Symphony Orchestra on October 30.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra which is conducted by the famous Russian musician, Serge Koussevitzki, will make its first appearance here in more than 25 years. The orchestra does not go on tour, and, with exception of concerts played for the last three or four years in Chicago, seldom leaves its home city.

Only because he felt the new university auditorium was a great step in forwarding the culture of the northwest did M. Koussevitzki consent to its appearance in Minneapolis.

Program to Be Drafted

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra is a cultural organization and I am glad to bring it to the University of Minnesota because I feel the new auditorium is a cultural building and will do much in a cultural way," the conductor told Mrs. Carlyle Scott, who arranged for its appearance as a part of the dedication program.

The concert of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra on October 22 is being especially arranged by Henri Verbrugghen, conductor, to carry out a festival spirit.

The programs marking the auditorium opening will culminate in November, when a general alumni and state occasion will be conducted. Details of the program have not been worked out, but it is expected that state, university and municipal officials will participate, with the major feature the presentation of the building and its acceptance by the university.

Will Cost $1,375,000

The first two programs of the Minneapolis and Boston symphonies also will be the first programs of the University concert course, which is under the direction of Mrs. Scott. Other numbers on the course will include the appearance of Roland Hayes, Negro tenor; Sigrid Onegin, contralto, and Mischa Levitzki, Russian pianist.

In a letter to alumni and students of the university recently sent out by President Lotus D. Coffman, he said that when the memorial auditorium was completed and equipped it would cost approximately $1,375,000.

$489,215 Given by Alumni

Complete equipping would include installation of stage effects and a large pipe organ, at a cost of approximately $175,000. This will not be done until money is available.

Expenditures for the building at the time of the dedication exercises will have amounted to almost $1,200,000. Of this amount $489,215 has been given by alumni and former students in payment of pledges made to the Greater University Corporation to provide the university with a stadium and an auditorium. The board of regents from the funds provided for a 10-year building program, have allotted $384,835 for the auditorium. The state legislature at its last session appropriated an additional $300,000.

ST. PAUL, MINN.
DISPATCH
SEP 16

SYMPHONY MUSIC TO MARK OPENING OF "U" AUDITORIUM

Orchestra Under Verbrugghen Baton to Play Festival Program October 22.

The new Cyrus Northrop auditorium on the campus of the University of Minnesota will open its doors for the first time October 22 when the Symphony orchestra, under Henri Verbrugghen, will play a festival program.

This concert hall, erected to the memory of the second president of the state university, is regarded by experts as one of the finest auditoriums in the Northwest. It occupies a dominating position in the recently developed section of the campus off Washington avenue. Attention to the technical requirements of a concert hall has been particularly careful and it has been called the last word in buildings of its kind.

Dedicatory services in memory of Cyrus Northrop will be held November 15 when there will be a general alumni and state program. The auditorium will be formally presented on that occasion and an address of acceptance will be made by a university official.

One of the most brilliant items of the fall program planned for the Cyrus Northrop auditorium will be the appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra under Serge Koussevitzki October 30. This will be the first performance in the Midwest which the orchestra has given under its present conductor.

Koussevitzki is regarded as one of the leaders among symphony conductors in America. His following in the East, not only in Boston but in New York and the other large cities as well, is tremendous and enthusiastic. The local concert will contribute an unusual and important item to the musical season.

Other events in the University concert course to be given in the Cyrus Northrop auditorium have also been announced by the director, Mrs. Carlyle Scott. They include a recital by Roland Hayes, the distinguished negro tenor; Sigrid Onegin, contralto, and Mischa Levitzki, pianist. Later in the season there will be a "surprise program" which, Mrs. Scott indicates, will probably be an evening of ballet dancing.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MINNEAPOLIS STAR

Boston Symphony Will Play at New Campus Memorial

Concert Oct. 30 Part of Northrop Auditorium Dedication

The Minneapolis Symphony orchestra and the Boston Symphony orchestra, which hasn't been heard in Minneapolis for more than 30 years, will take part in dedicatory programs arranged to herald completion and opening to the public of the new Cyrus Northrop Memorial auditorium on the University of Minnesota campus.

Announcement of these programs, and others which will be a part of the University Concert course, was made today by Mrs. Carlyle Scott, who will be in charge of arrangements for the course.

Boston Concert Oct. 30

The first dedicatory program will be played Oct. 22 by the Minneapolis Symphony under direction of Henri Verbrugghen. The concert will be in the form of a music festival.

The Boston orchestra, which is not a traveling organization, has been induced to pay its second visit to Minneapolis Oct. 30 and will play a concert at the new auditorium on that date. Serge Koussevitzki will conduct the aggregation which numbers more than 100 musicians.

Honor Northrop's Memory

A general alumni and state program honoring the memory of the late Cyrus Northrop has been arranged for Nov. 15. At this time, the auditorium will be formally dedicated and will be accepted officially by state and university officials.

Other evenings in the University concert course will include programs by Roland Hayes, distinguished negro tenor; Sigrid Onegin, world famous contralto; Mischa Levitzki, pianist, and a surprise program, which, according to Mrs. Scott, doubtless will be an evening of ballet.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. PAUL, MINN.
NEWS
SEP 16 1929

Symphony Orchestra to Assist at Opening of Northrop Auditorium

Boston and Minneapolis Symphony orchestras will take part in the opening of the new Cyrus Northrop auditorium at the University of Minnesota.

A series of three dedicatory programs will be conducted in the new auditorium in October and November. The first will be a concert by the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra.

The dedication will culminate in a general alumni and state program in memory of Cyrus Northrop, Nov. 15. The auditorium will be formally presented and accepted during this program.

One of the outstanding programs of the season in the new auditorium will be Mrs. Carlyle Scott's series of concerts which hitherto have been conducted in the university armory. The current season will include, in addition to the two symphony concerts, Roland Hayes, negro tenor; Sigrid Onegin, contralto; Mischa Levitzki, pianist, and one attraction to be announced later.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL

Boston Symphony Conductor to Give University Program

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKI, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will bring his famous musical organization to Minneapolis October 22 to appear at the new Northrop Memorial Auditorium of the University of Minnesota as a part of the dedication exercises for the new building.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER PRESS
OCT 13

GOVERNOR INVITED TO DEDICATION OF AUDITORIUM AT U

Plans for Services at Cyrus Northrop Memorial Announced.

All alumni of the University of Minnesota, Governor Christianson, John A. Johnson, speaker of the House of Representatives, Lieutenant Governor Charles A. Adams and officers of the Greater University corporation will be invited to the dedication of Cyrus Northrop Memorial auditorium.

This dedication, the principal and last one of a series of three, will be held in the auditorium November 15.

Invitation plans were announced Sunday by the committee in charge of the dedication, consisting of James C. Lawrence, assistant to the president; William T. Middlebrook, University comptroller, and Mrs. Carlyle M. Scott, director of the University concert course.

The Minneapolis and Boston Symphony orchestras will feature the first two dedicatory programs which will be held on October 22 and 30, respectively.

A single address, a eulogy of the late Dr. Cyrus Northrop, president of the University from 1885 to 1911, will be delivered at the main dedication by Dr. Russell Henry Stafford, pastor of Old South Church in Boston.

Thomas F. Wallace, president of the Greater University corporation, will present tthe auditorium to the University in behalf of the corporation. Governor Christianson, if he attends the exercises, will respond.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS
TRIBUNE

Concerts by Boston and Minneapolis Orchestras to Be Basis for Comparison Variety Marks Programs Arranged for Present Season—Many Famous Soloists to Be Featured.

By James Davies.

OUR concert [illegible] year will [illegible]

NEXT in importance is the University concert series under the management of Mrs. Carlyle Scott. This year the audiences who attend these concerts will be seated in one of the finest halls in the country. The initial concert is to be given by our own symphony orchestra October 22, when a gala program will be played, nothing too heavy, and each selection easy of digestion. There will be brief speeches and a lot of other interesting items designed to make the dedication of the new Northrup Memorial hall memorable in the annals of Minneapolis music.

On October 30, Serge Koussevitsky, with the entire Boston symphony orchestra [illegible] to Minneapolis for the first time in many, many years, playing a program in the same hall, and all of musical Minneapolis expects to be present on this occasion. Could the audience but realize what difficulties have been overcome to induce the famous Russian leader and the powers back of the Boston orchestra to come to this city, their presence would be appreciated ten-fold. Many hundreds in this city received part of their musical education listening to this great organization either in the old symphony hall near Boston Common or in the newer building, and they may rest assured the old traditions have been preserved through the years by a fairly long line of celebrated conductors.

* * *

KOUSSEVITSKY has become recognized as one of the outstanding leaders of our time. Boston is satised with him, which means a great deal, and his presence is requested by scores of cities he will never visit. We are singularly fortunate in having this opportunity, and while, as I said at the beginning of this article, there will be the inevitable comparisons between the young and the old I am thoroughly convinced we will win from both a musical inspiration that will endure.

Another of the attractions engaged for the University concerts is Roland Hayes, the Negro tenor. Nothing further need be said than [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS
TRIBUNE

Grace N

IT IS common knowledge now that after a lapse of many years the Boston Symphony orchestra is again to be heard in this city. Wherever orchestras are spoken of throughout the world, that belonging to Boston is mentioned with honor, for its career has been unmatched by any similar organization in this country and only a few in the entire world can claim greater length of years of service.

This orchestra has played under a long series of famous conductors, of many nationalities, and today, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitsky, it still maintains its ancient prestige as second to none.

Mr. Koussevitsky has arranged a program of fine proportions for this concert, with the great Beethoven symphony No. 5 at the apex. Known primarily as a conductor with decided leanings toward modern music and Russian music especially, he has demonstrated times without number that there is no limits to his musical interests.

This concert will be given October 30 in the new Northrop Memori hall on the university campus as t second in the regular university c cert series.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL

U. TO DEDICATE NEW AUDITORIUM OCT. 22 TO NOV. 15

Alumni and State Will Take Part in Acceptance Ceremonies

2 FAMOUS SYMPHONIES BOOKED FOR CONCERTS

Verbrugghen Arranging Opening Program to Carry Out Festival Spirit

Dedication exercises for the new Cyrus Northrop Memorial Auditorium at the University of Minnesota will start October 22 and continue through November 15, it was announced today.

The dedication program will include the appearances of two of the country's leading musical organizations, the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra on October 22 and the Boston Symphony Orchestra on October 30.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra which is conducted by the famous Russian musician, Serge Koussevitzki, will make its first appearance here in more than 25 years. The orchestra does not go on tour, and, with exception of concerts played for the last three or four years in Chicago, seldom leaves its home city.

Only because he felt the new university auditorium was a great step in forwarding the culture of the northwest did M. Koussevitzki consent to its appearance in Minneapolis.

Program to Be Drafted

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra is a cultural organization and I am glad to bring it to the University of Minnesota because I feel the new auditorium is a cultural building and will do much in a cultural way," the conductor told Mrs. Carlyle Scott, who arranged for its appearance as a part of the dedication program.

The concert of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra on October 2[2] is being especially arranged by Henri Verbrugghen, conductor, to carry out a festival spirit.

The programs marking the auditorium opening will culminate in November, when a general alumni and state occasion will be conducted. Details of the program have not been worked out, but it is expected that state, university and municipal officials will participate, with the major feature the presentation of the building and its acceptance by the university.

Will Cost $1,375,000

The first two programs of the Minneapolis and Boston symphonies also will be the first programs of the University concert course, which is under the direction of Mrs. Scott. Other numbers on the course will include the appearance of Roland Hayes, Negro tenor; Sigrid Onegin, contralto, and Mischa Levitzki, Russian pianist.

In a letter to alumni and students of the university recently sent out by President Lotus D. Coffman, he said that when the memorial auditorium was completed and equipped it would cost approximately $1,375,000.

$489,215 Given by Alumni

Complete equipping would include installation of stage effects and a large pipe organ, at a cost of approximately $175,000. This will not be done until money is available.

Expenditures for the building at the time of the dedication exercises will have amounted to almost $1,200,000. Of this amount $489,215 has been given by alumni and former students in payment of pledges made to the Greater University Corporation to provide the university with a stadium and an auditorium. The board of regents from the funds provided for a 10-year building program, have allotted $384,835 for the auditorium. The state legislature at its last session appropriated an additional $300,000.

ST. PAUL, MINN.
DISPATCH
SEP 16

SYMPHONY MUSIC TO MARK OPENING OF "U" AUDITORIUM

Orchestra Under Verbrugghen Baton to Play Festival Program October 22.

The new Cyrus Northrop auditorium on the campus of the University of Minnesota will open its doors for the first time October 22 when the Symphony orchestra, under Henri Verbrugghen, will play a festival program.

This concert hall, erected to the memory of the second president of the state university, is regarded by experts as one of the finest auditoriums in the Northwest. It occupies a dominating position in the recently developed section of the campus off Washington avenue. Attention to the technical requirements of a concert hall has been particularly careful and it has been called the last word in buildings of its kind.

Dedicatory services in memory of Cyrus Northrop will be held November 15 when there will be a general alumni and state program. The auditorium will be formally presented on that occasion and an address of acceptance will be made by a university official.

One of the most brilliant items of the fall program planned for the Cyrus Northrop auditorium will be the appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra under Serge Koussevitzki October 30. This will be the first performance in the Midwest which the orchestra has given under its present conductor.

Koussevitzki is regarded as one of the leaders among symphony conductors in America. His following in the East, not only in Boston but in New York and the other large cities as well, is tremendous and enthusiastic. The local concert will contribute an unusual and important item to the musical season.

Other events in the University concert course to be given in the Cyrus Northrop auditorium have also been announced by the director, Mrs. Carlyle Scott. They include a recital by Roland Hayes, the distinguished negro tenor; Sigrid Onegin, contralto, and Mischa Levitzki, pianist. Later in the season there will be a "surprise program" which, Mrs. Scott indicates, will probably be an evening of ballet dancing by one of the world famous groups.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. PAUL, MINN.
NEWS
SEP 16 1929

Symphony Orchestra to Assist at Opening of Northrop Auditorium

Boston and Minneapolis Symphony orchestras will take part in the opening of the new Cyrus Northrop auditorium at the University of Minnesota.

A series of three dedicatory programs will be conducted in the new auditorium in October and November. The first will be a concert by the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra Oct. 22.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will make its appearance in the auditorium Oct. 30. This orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzki, is considered one of the two or three best in America.

The dedication will culminate in a general alumni and state program in memory of Cyrus Northrop, Nov. 15. The auditorium will be formally presented and accepted during this program.

One of the outstanding programs of the season in the new auditorium will be Mrs. Carlyle Scott's series of concerts which hitherto have been conducted in the university armory. The current season will include, in addition to the two symphony concerts, Roland Hayes, negro tenor; Sigrid Onegin, contralto; Mischa Levitzki, pianist, and one attraction to be announced later.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKI, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will bring his famous musical organization to Minneapolis October 22 to appear at the new Northrop Memorial Auditorium of the University of Minnesota as a part of the dedication exercises for the new building.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS
TRIBUNE

Concerts by Boston and Minneapolis Orchestras to Be Basis for Comparison Variety Marks Programs Arranged for Present Season—Many Famous Soloists to Be Featured.

By James Davies.

OUR concert [illegible] year will [illegible]

NEXT in importance is the University concert series under the management of Mrs. Carlyle Scott. This year the audiences who attend these concerts will be seated in one of the finest halls in the country. The initial concert is to be given by our own symphony orchestra October 22, when a gala program will be played, nothing too heavy, and each selection easy of digestion. There will be brief speeches and a lot of other interesting items designed to make the dedication of the new Northrup Memorial hall memorable in the annals of Minneapolis music.

On October 30, Serge Koussevitsky, with the entire Boston symphony orchestra [illegible] to Minneapolis for the first time in many, many years, playing a program in the same hall, and all of musical Minneapolis expects to be present on this occasion. Could the audience but realize what difficulties have been overcome to induce the famous Russian leader and the powers back of the Boston orchestra to come to this city, their presence would be appreciated ten-fold. Many hundreds in this city received part of their musical education listening to this great organization either in the old symphony hall near Boston Common or in the newer building, and they may rest assured the old traditions have been preserved through the years by a fairly long line of celebrated conductors.

* * *

KOUSSEVITSKY has become recognized as one of the outstanding leaders of our time. Boston is satised with him, which means a great deal, and his presence is requested by scores of cities he will never visit. We are singularly fortunate in having this opportunity, and while, as I said at the beginning of this article, there will be the inevitable comparisons between the young and the old I am thoroughly convinced we will win from both a musical inspiration that will endure.

Another of the attractions engaged for the University concerts is Roland Hayes, the Negro tenor. Nothing further need be said than

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS
TRIBUNE

Grace N

IT IS common knowledge now that after a lapse of many years the Boston Symphony orchestra is again to be heard in this city. Wherever orchestras are spoken of throughout the world, that belonging to Boston is mentioned with honor, for its career has been unmatched by any similar organization in this country and only a few in the entire world can claim greater length of years of service.

This orchestra has played under a long series of famous conductors, of many nationalities, and today, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitsky, it still maintains its ancient prestige as second to none.

Mr. Koussevitsky has arranged a program of fine proportions for this concert, with the great Beethoven symphony No. 5 at the apex. Known primarily as a conductor with decided leanings toward modern music and Russian music especially, he has demonstrated times without number that there is no limits to his musical interests.

This concert will be given October 30 in the new Northrop Memori hall on the university campus as t second in the regular university c cert series.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER PRESS
OCT 14

[illegible] Campus Memorial

Concert Oct. 30 Part of Northrop Auditorium Dedication

The Minneapolis Symphony orchestra and the Boston Symphony orchestra, which has not been heard in Minneapolis for more than 30 years, will take part in dedicatory programs arranged to herald completion and opening to the public of the new Cyrus Northrop Memorial auditorium on the University of Minnesota campus.

Announcement of these programs, and others which will be a part of the University Concert course, was made today by Mrs. Carlyle Scott, who wlill be in charge of arrangements for the course.

Boston Concert Oct. 30

The first dedicatory program will be played Oct. 22 by the Minneapolis Symphony under direction of Henri Verbrugghen. The concert will be in the form of a music festival.

The Boston orchestra, which is not a traveling organization, has been induced to pay its second visit to Minneapolis Oct. 30 and will play a concert at the new auditorium on that date. Serge Koussevitzki will conduct the aggregation which numbers more than 100 musicians.

Honor Northrop's Memory

A general alumni and state program honoring the memory of the late Cyrus Northrop has been arranged for Nov. 15. At this time, the auditorium will be formally dedicated and will be accepted officially by state and university officials.

Other evenings in the University concert course will include programs by Roland Hayes, distinguished negro tenor; Sigrid Onegin, world famous contralto; Mischa Levitzki, pianist, and a surprise program, which, according to Mrs. Scott, doubtless will be an evening of ballet.

GOVERNOR INVITED TO DEDICATION OF AUDITORIUM AT U

Plans for Services at Cyrus Northrop Memorial Announced.

All alumni of the University of Minnesota, Governor Christianson, John A. Johnson, speaker of the House of Representatives, Lieutenant Governor Charles A. Adams and officers of the Greater University corporation will be invited to the dedication of Cyrus Northrop Memorial auditorium.

This dedication, the principal and last one of a series of three, will be held in the auditorium November 15.

Invitation plans were announced Sunday by the committee in charge of the dedication, consisting of James C. Lawrence, assistant to the president; William T. Middlebrook, University comptroller, and Mrs. Carlyle M. Scott, director of the University concert course.

The Minneapolis and Boston Symphony orchestras will feature the first two dedicatory programs which will be held on October 22 and 30, respectively.

A single address, a eulogy of the late Dr. Cyrus Northrop, president of the University from 1885 to 1911, will be delivered at the main dedication by Dr. Russell Henry Stafford, pastor of Old South Church in Boston.

Thomas F. Wallace, president of the Greater University corporation, will present tthe auditorium to the University in behalf of the corporation. Governor Christianson, if he attends the exercises, will respond.

152

152

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS
JOURNAL

Cyrus Northrop Auditorium Dedication

THE dedicatory concerts of the Cyrus Northrop Memorial auditorium which will constitute the opening events of the annual concert course series of the University of Minnesota are now close at hand.

The first dedicatory concert takes place Tuesday evening and will consist in a festival program given by the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra under the direction of its music conductor, Henri Verbrugghen. Eunice Norton, the rising young Minnesota pianist, will be the soloist and will play the Liszt E flat major concerto with the orchestra. The program is given elsewhere.

The second dedicatory concert will be given October 30, or a week from next Wednesday, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor. The program to be presented by this celebrated organization, which has not appeared here since Arthur Nikisch was its leader, will embrace "Concerta Grosso," by Handel, for string orchestra; two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," by Debussy; the second suite from "Daphnis and Chloe," a choreographic symphony by Ravel, and Beethoven's fifth or "Fate" symphony.

* * *

Some years ago, in the Conservatory of Moscow, a pupil named Serge Koussevitzky astonished everyone by his skill upon the double bass. He had chosen this unusual instrument because every student in the orchestral class was required to specialize in either a brass instrument or the double bass.

It was not long before the young man was coaxing from his great lumbering instrument a tone, a songfulness, a dignity and grace that no one had dreamt the double bass could possess. That this giant violin had to be bowed at arm's length, with a stoop, and its bow grasped flatwise, like a hacksaw, seemed to bother its young master not in the least. Soon the name of Serge Koussevitzky became known across Europe as a double bass virtuoso to whom no one in the present or past could be compared. He made his instrument discourse divinely, as if it were a cello of marvelously deepened and enriched tone.

Yet the artist Koussevitzky could not long have been satisfied with such a limited medium of expression. He inevitably sought that most expressive of instrument—the full symphony orchestra. As a conductor, Koussevitzky again showed Europe new and unprecedented beauties in musical performance. In Russia, in Paris or London, the "Koussevitzky concerts" became electric with the commanding and inspiring genius of this extraordinary artist.

* * *

Five years ago, Koussevitzky came to America and had for the first time a great orchestra to do his bidding. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, for many years reputed the finest organization of its kind in America, actually reached new heights of perfection under the extraordinary Russian leader.

It has thus been more than once demonstrated that Koussevitzky's genius is the sort that begins where another would leave off. Whether it is a solo instrument or an orchestra before him, a splendid technical achievement is but the starting point toward still subtler beauties and a still deeper significance.

As the Boston Symphony Orchestra approaches its fiftieth year, to be celebrated next season, its famed precision, ensemble, and tonal beauty excel even the most glorious days of its illustrious past. And these qualities are liberating more than ever before Koussevitzky's ranging artist's vision.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS
JOURNAL

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE WEDNESDAY

Will Feature Second Dedication Program at Northrop Auditorium

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, composed of 110 musicians, under the direction of an internationally known condutor, will appear in concert in the Cyrus Northrop Memorial auditorium Wednesday night.

This will be the second of two musical dedication programs of the auditorium, the first having been the concert there by the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra last Tuesday.

The program, which will begin at 8:15 p.m., follows:

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra—
Opus 6, No. 10 ..... Handel
Nocturnes, Nuages and Fetes ..... Debussy
Orchestral Excerpts from the Ballet,
"Daphnis et Chloe," second suite.
Lever du Jour—Pantomime—Danse
Generale ..... Ravel
Intermission.
Symphony No. 5 in C minor,
Opus 67 ..... Beethoven
I Allegro
II Andante con moto.
III Allegro; trio.
IV Allegro.

The concert is one of the series numbers in Mrs. Carlyle M. Scott's eleventh annual university concert course.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER PRESS
OCT 27

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT U WEDNESDAY

Concert Second of Dedicatory Events for Northrop Auditorium.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, composed of 110 musicians and conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, internationally known musical figure, will appear in concert in the Cyrus Northrop Memorial auditorium at the University of Minnesota Wednesday night.

This will be the second of two preliminary dedicatory events in the auditorium, the first having been the concert there by the Symphony orchestra Tuesday. Both concerts are included in Mrs. Carlyle M. Scott's eleventh annual concert course at the University.

The program:

Concerto grosso for string orchestra.
Opus 6, No. 10 ..... Handel
Nocturnes, Nuages and Fetes ..... Debussy
Orchestral excerpts from the Ballet,
"Daphnis et Choes," second suite.
Lever du Jour, Pantomine, Danse
Generale ..... Ravel

INTERMISSION.

Symphony No. 5 in C minor, opus 67 Beethoven

1. Allegro con brio.
2. Andante con moto.
3. Allegro; trio.
4. Allegro.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS
JOURNAL

Music

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

THE Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will give the program of the second dedicatory concert at Cyrus Northrop Memorial Auditorium Wednesday night. Ginna Pinnera, soprano, will be the soloist Friday night at the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra's regular Lyceum concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS
TRIBUNE

Boston Symphony Will Play at 'U'

Concert Wednesday Will Be Part of Auditorium Dedication Program.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, composed of 110 musicians and conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, internationally known musical figure, will appear in concert in the Cyrus Northrop Memorial auditorium at the University of Minnesota Wednesday night.

This will be the second of two preliminary dedicatory events in the auditorium, the first having been the concert there by the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra last Tuesday. Both concerts are series members in Mrs. Carlyle M. Scott's eleventh annual concert course at the university.

The program which will begin at 8:15 p. m., follows:

Concerto grosso for string orchestra
Opus 6, No. 10 ..... Handel
Nocturnes, Nuages and Fetes ..... Debussy
Orchestral excerpts from the Ballet,
"Daphnis et Chloe"
Second suite
Lever du Jour—Pantomime
Danse Generale ..... Ravel

INTERMISSION

Symphony No. 5 in C minor,
Opus 67 ..... Beethoven
I. Allegro con brio.
II Andante con moto
III. Allegro; trio
IV. Allegro.

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS
TRIBUNE
OCT 27 1929

Kussevitsky, Leader of Boston Symphony, Has Had Checquered Career

Noted Russian and 'Hub City' Musicians to Give Concert Wednesday in Northrop Auditorium.

By James Davies.

FEW, if any of the world's great conductors have experienced such a checquered career as the famous leader of the Boston symphony orchestra, Serge Kussevitsky, who is to appear in the new Northrop auditorium, October 30, with his equally famous organization. It is said that he first conducted as a boy of 12, when he led the local orchestra at his birthplace in the province of Tver, northern Russia. As a student at the conservatory at Moscow he was obliged to learn an instrument and chose the doublebass with the noted teacher, Ramboussec, as his teacher. So great was his proficiency on this instrument that he toured through Europe, playing with the great orchestras and in concert to the great astonishment of those who had little faith in the bull fiddle as a solo instrument.

His skill was unbelievable for he may be ranked with the leading virtuosi of any time, on any instrument, in his interpretations of the comparatively few masterpieces written for this ungainly medium. I heard him perform under Arthur Nikisch in the Gewnadhaus at one of the regular symphony concerts and learned, for the first time, that with such a master as this wielding the bow the doublebass could be made a vehicle for the expression of musical thought and emotion unsurpassed by any other kind of string instrument.

* * *

BUT HIS aim was orchestral leadership and we find him in 1909 with his own orchestra in Moscow, which finally became known as the finest in Russia. Not content, however, with existing merely for the benefit of the classes he took his orchestra the long length of the Volga river—2,500 miles—chartering the steamer himself, carrying soloists, a few friends, and the spirit of great music greatly played for the pleasure and profit of those who had never heard a great orchestra. These trips he repeated several times.

He founded a publishing house by means of which the works of young composers were given to the world, young men who have become famous since that time, including Stravinsky and Prokofieff. Thanks to the combination of publishing house and orchestra these compositions quickly became known to Russia and the world at large and the leap from obscurity to fame had been made.

* * *

NATURALLY the revolution in Russia compelled certain changes, but Kussevitsky, while losing his own orchestra did conduct the Russian State orchestra. Then in 1920 he was heard as conductor in Paris where he assembled his own orchestra and since that time he has conducted his annual series of "Concerts Kussevitsky" at the opera house. He became known in England through invitations to act as guest conductor of Sir Henry Wood's orchestra in London. Through these, through operatic performances in Paris and elsewhere and by his work with the Boston symphony orchestra he has become recognized as one of the most brilliant, inspired, and inspiring conductors in the world.

Each year, at the conclusion of the Boston season, he returns to Europe for the Paris and London series, he has conducted in every musical city of note in England and France, he is regarded as the most discerning conductor in selecting modern works for performance while never neglecting either the romanticists nor the classics.

* * *

UNDER Kussevitsky's baton the Boston orchestra has won back to the distinction it enjoyed during the halcyon days of Gericke, Pauer, Nikisch, Muck, Fiedler, Rabaud and Monteux. Coming to Boston in 1924, at a time when certain changes had to be faced, when the old orchestra had been split into factions, when it had failed to respond to the efforts of other conductors and seemed to be in danger of dissolution, he took charge, built up and won through to what is perhaps the most enviable position as conductor in America.

We have heard much of Kussevitsky the ultra-modernist but examine his programs and we find a splendid balance is maintained between old and new. For the program to be played next Wednesday evening at the University in the Northrop Memorial hall he has chosen the Beethoven fifth symphony as the chief number. It is said of him that he gives to this work a highly dramatic interpretation, an interpretation entirely individual and positive, stimulating speculation on the right or wrong of the conventional conception of Beethoven's music.

Debussy's Nocturnes: "Clouds" and "Festivals" reveal this conductor as an impressionistic painter, the fact that he paints in tones instead of pigments emphasizes this classification. Here is music where mood and subtle suggestion inter-play, and we are told no shade of meaning is lost.

* * *

THE PROGRAM will open with Haendel's Concerto Grosso," selected, no doubt, to show the wonderful perfection of tone and ensemble secured by the string section of the Boston orchestra. In Ravel's suite from "Daphne and Chloe" we find loveliness and grace of superlative order. Ravel's skill in writing for wood winds may be traced in "Dawn" and "Pantomime" of this suite. The closing "general dance" has been termed the most strongly rhythmed and tumultuous music written by the French composer.

Here is variety enough for anybody, variety of a kind that will demonstrate the manysidedness of the organization, that will enable the hearer to judge section by section the composition of this famous orchestra.

A tremendous audience is assured for the concert, people are coming from all over the state, both to see the hall, to hear the music and to learn something at first hand of the man we in the northwest have heard so much about. It will be another gala evening within the walls of the building dedicated to the memory of one of the greatest men, if not the greatest, this state has produced.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER PRESS
OCT 27 1929

154

Koussevitsky and Orchestra Due Wednesday

Famed Boston Organization Will Play at "U"; Verbruggen Gives Third Symphony Thursday.

With the preoccupying demands of a season of grand opera behind them, local followers of things musical will be able to give their attention once more to the orchestral events. One of those scheduled for the current week is of especial interest. Serge Koussevitsky will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra in a concert at the Cyrus Northrop Auditorium at the University on Wednesday, October 30. On the following night, Thursday, the local symphony orchestra under Henri Verbrugghen will give the third concert of the season at the Auditorium.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It is considerably more than ten years since the Boston Symphony orchestra has ventured so far west as this to give a concert. On the occasion of the last appearance Koussevitsky was not the conductor. His visit to the Cyrus Northrop Auditorium will be the first that he has made to Minnesota.

Serge Koussevitsky became director of the Boston Symphony in 1924 when it had just weathered a period of disruption and disturbance following the war. In the years during which he has presided over its destinies he has restored it to the place which it had held so long as one of the great orchestras of the world.

The personal history of this extraordinarily brilliant man is of unusual interest. His name must be put on the list of child prodigies whose early indications of great gifts have been justi[fied] by later performances. Koussevitsky made his pro[fessional] a conductor in his [native] Russia, at the [age of] The authority for [this] not say how long [he held] such a post at [the] velopment, but to [remain] to remain on the whole evening is ough.

ing beginning, he al studies first in Berlin under Ar- 09 he founded his with it toured years. At the led his own muuse. In 1917 he here his publish- eadquarters after on.

1924 he toured Boston has ensince that time d which he de- f concerts which Paris.

hear the Boston in Minnesota is is so committed a audience that opportunity for he orchestra's consists of five ton, one in Prov ew York. This rdinarily full one xcursions.

n on Koussevitas conductor, in musical af- double bass viol rtist's supreme his instrument d a concerto for h Koussevitsky ncert to be giv- Auditorium on s reflects some ar musical en- s.

s 6, No. 10, ...Handel ds and Fes- .....Debussy s and Chloe— Beethoven .....Beethoven

PRINCIPAL FIGURES IN

Serge Koussevitsky shown above is the very active and d chestra with which he will appear in a concert to be giv Auditorium at the University of Minnesota. Gina Pinne chestra under Mr. Verbrugghen on Thursa

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
STAR
OCT 28

The Boston Symphony

CONCERTGOERS this week are turning their eyes and ears toward the Northrop Memorial auditorium where, on Wednesday night, the renowned Boston Symphony orchestra with its equally renowned conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will appear in its first concert in [illegible].

If all the accounts which have been written of this famous orchestra are true, the concert should prove one of the most momentous and enjoyable of a music season that already is crowded with good things. No less valuable, from the local symphony lover's viewpoint, will be the opportunity it affords for a new perspective on the quality of our own orchestra.

Far-off things often exude a glamour never associated with local phenomena, and the remote Boston Symphony illustrates well the truth that "distance lends enchantment." Minneapolis devotees of music now have a chance to see whether that glamour will survive under the conditions of "here and now" and may experience, in the bargain, a vivid revelation of the value and importance, by the light of comparison, of our home-grown symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MINNEAPOLIS STAR

Boston Symphony in Concert Tonight

The second preliminary dedicatory event at the Cyrus Northrop memorial auditorium at the University of Minnesota will be held tonight when the Boston Symphony orchestra appears in concert. The first event in connection with the dedication was last Tuesday when the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra presented a concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
EVE. TRIBUNE

BEFORE THE CONCERT TO BE given by the Boston Symphony orchestra Wednesday evening in the Cyrus Northrup auditorium at the University of Minnesota, Miss Eunice Norton and her parents, Mr. and Mrs. W. I. Norton of the Oak Grove hotel, will be guests of Governor and Mrs. Theodore Christianson at dinner in their home. Mrs. Elbert L. Carpenter of Clifton avenue will be hostess at an informal tea for Miss Norton Friday afternoon. Miss Norton returned to Minneapolis from England to be the piano soloist with the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra at the dedicatory concert in the Northrop auditorium October 22. She will give a radio program with the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra Sunday.

Honor nductors

rs. Theodore in at a dinner honor of Serge or of the Bos- tra. Tomor- Verbrugghen in his honor. y Orchestra dicatory con- rthrop Me- morrow eve-cously referred to, derived from the flute-and-trumpet theme of the introduction. This double theme is repeated. Then comes the first subsidiary theme, introduced by recitativ-like violas, itself an energetic theme for violins, horns and English horn. It also is heard variously, with some reversion to the main theme. The sharply rhythmed chords of the beginning usher in what earlier composers would have made the development.

Bax develops fully and ingeniously. Near the end of this section is a second subsidiary theme, simple, melodic, lyrical. It enters for flute and 'cello solo, is in itself much repeated and developed. Unorthodox is the introduction of a new theme here. Who can say that it is not a stroke of genius, affording relief, before proceeding again with the already much-worked material? The last section, call it "recapitulation" if you will, follows largely the "exposition," but in reverse order. After reference to the opening harmonies of the introduction, to the main theme of the movement, to the "declamato theme," to the fanfare of the introduction, and a new development of the second subsidiary, it states the two portions of the main theme with its original second part first. Then for Coda follows material of the introduction —the "declamato" theme, the three-note motto, an energetic conclusion. All of which is a mere skeleton outline of Bax's four hundred and twenty-eight measures. There are other "themelets" besides the ones indicated.

To Conclude

The Andante is far simpler. After some delicious playing with slightly Debussian chords, basses and 'cellos, frequently reinforced by horns, develop a theme out of the pizzicato motto of the introduction. Then there is a "cantabile" theme for violins, simple, lyrical, direct. After a time violas with an octave-leap introduce the chief contrasting theme, also lyrical, but more rhythmically active than the first. There is some development, more of the fragmentary contrasting themes, and briefer restatement and redevelopment of the tw lyrical themes with some appearan s of the "motto" for coda.

he last movement is dominated by a gle, long, far-flung theme. The ten measures of the introduction occupy themselves chiefly with the motto. Then that motto yields the most important theme it has yet generated. The eight measures remind one somewhat of the extended flights of Strauss. Not only in range is there resemblance. The new eight-measure theme is pregnant with as many motifs for development as though Strauss had written it. These are in turn freely and energetically developed, until strings, brass and woodwinds all join in a subsidiary theme "molto feroce" of large sweep and breadth. There is more development of motives from the main theme. After this subsides there are many repeated notes in strings, in varied rhythms, which soon serve as accompaniment for a "cello cantabile." There is still further development of the main theme, after which the ambiguous passage from the introduction to the first movement, as already described. Which, after restatement of the initial "declamato" theme, and a final plucking of the "motto," leads to the mysterious close faintly suggesting the two keys of the symphony.

A. H. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS
TRIBUNE
OCT 27 1928

Kussevitsky, Leader of Boston Symphony, Has Had Checquered Career

Noted Russian and 'Hub City' Musicians to Give Concert Wednesday in Northrop Auditorium.

By James Davies.

FEW, if any of the world's great conductors have experienced such a checquered career as the famous leader of the Boston symphony orchestra, Serge Kussevitsky, who is to appear in the new Northrop auditorium, October 30, with his equally famous organization. It is said that he first conducted as a boy of 12, when he led the local orchestra at his birthplace in the province of Tver, northern Russia. As a student at the conservatory at Moscow he was obliged to learn an instrument and chose the doublebass with the noted teacher, Ramboussec, as his teacher. So great was his proficiency on this instrument that he toured through Europe, playing with the great orchestras and in concert to the great astonishment of those who had little faith in the bull fiddle as a solo instrument.

His skill was unbelievable for he may be ranked with the leading virtuosi of any time, on any instrument, in his interpretations of the comparatively few masterpieces written for this ungainly medium. I heard him perform under Arthur Nikisch in the Gewnadhaus at one of the regular symphony concerts and learned, for the first time, that with such a master as this wielding the bow the doublebass could be made a vehicle for the expression of musical thought and emotion unsurpassed by any other kind of string instrument.

* * *

BUT HIS aim was orchestral leadership and we find him in 1909 with his own orchestra in Moscow, which finally became known as the finest in Russia. Not content, however, with existing merely for the benefit of the classes he took his orchestra the long length of the Volga river—2,500 miles—chartering the steamer himself, carrying soloists, a few friends, and the spirit of great music greatly played for the pleasure and profit of those who had never heard a great orchestra. These trips he repeated several times.

He founded a publishing house by means of which the works of young composers were given to the world, young men who have become famous since that time, including Stravinsky and Prokofieff. Thanks to the combination of publishing house and orchestra these compositions quickly became known to Russia and the world at large and the leap from obscurity to fame had been made.

* * *

NATURALLY the revolution in Russia compelled certain changes, but Kussevitsky, while losing his own orchestra did conduct the Russian State orchestra. Then in 1920 he was heard as conductor in Paris where he assembled his own orchestra and since that time he has conducted his annual series of "Concerts Kussevitsky" at the opera house. He became known in England through invitations to act as guest conductor of Sir Henry Wood's orchestra in London. Through these, through operatic performances in Paris and elsewhere and by his work with the Boston symphony orchestra he has become recognized as one of the most brilliant, inspired, and inspiring conductors in the world.

Each year, at the conclusion of the Boston season, he returns to Europe for the Paris and London series, he has conducted in every musical city of note in England and France, he is regarded as the most discerning conductor in selecting modern works for performance while never neglecting either the romanticists nor the classics.

* * *

UNDER Kussevitsky's baton the Boston orchestra has won back to the distinction it enjoyed during the halcyon days of Gericke, Pauer, Nikisch, Muck, Fiedler, Rabaud and Monteux. Coming to Boston in 1924, at a time when certain changes had to be faced, when the old orchestra had been split into factions, when it had failed to respond to the efforts of other conductors and seemed to be in danger of dissolution, he took charge, built up and won through to what is perhaps the most enviable position as conductor in America.

We have heard much of Kussevitsky the ultra-modernist but examine his programs and we find a splendid balance is maintained between old and new. For the program to be played next Wednesday evening at the University in the Northrop Memorial hall he has chosen the Beethoven fifth symphony as the chief number. It is said of him that he gives to this work a highly dramatic interpretation, an interpretation entirely individual and positive, stimulating speculation on the right or wrong of the conventional conception of Beethoven's music.

Debussy's Nocturnes: "Clouds" and "Festivals" reveal this conductor as an impressionistic painter, the fact that he paints in tones instead of pigments emphasizes this classification. Here is music where mood and subtle suggestion inter-play, and we are told no shade of meaning is lost.

* * *

THE PROGRAM will open with Haendel's Concerto Grosso," selected, no doubt, to show the wonderful perfection of tone and ensemble secured by the string section of the Boston orchestra. In Ravel's suite from "Daphne and Chloe" we find loveliness and grace of superlative order. Ravel's skill in writing for wood winds may be traced in "Dawn" and "Pantomime" of this suite. The closing "general dance" has been termed the most strongly rhythmed and tumultuous music written by the French composer.

Here is variety enough for anybody, variety of a kind that will demonstrate the manysidedness of the organization, that will enable the hearer to judge section by section the composition of this famous orchestra.

A tremendous audience is assured for the concert, people are coming from all over the state, both to see the hall, to hear the music and to learn something at first hand of the man we in the northwest have heard so much about. It will be another gala evening within the walls of the building dedicated to the memory of one of the greatest men, if not the greatest, this state has produced.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER PRESS
OCT 27 1928

154

Koussevitsky and Orchestra Due Wednesday

Famed Boston Organization Will Play at "U"; Verbruggen Gives Third Symphony Thursday.

With the preoccupying demands of a season of grand opera behind them, local followers of things musical will be able to give their attention once more to the orchestral events. One of those scheduled for the current week is of especial interest. Serge Koussevitsky will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra in a concert at the Cyrus Northrop Auditorium at the University on Wednesday, October 30. On the following night, Thursday, the local symphony orchestra under Henri Verbrugghen will give the third concert of the season at the Auditorium.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It is considerably more than ten years since the Boston Symphony orchestra has ventured so far west as this to give a concert. On the occasion of the last appearance Koussevitsky was not the conductor. His visit to the Cyrus Northrop Auditorium will be the first that he has made to Minnesota.

Serge Koussevitsky became director of the Boston Symphony in 1924 when it had just weathered a period of disruption and disturbance following the war. In the years during which he has presided over its destinies he has restored it to the place which it had held so long as one of the great orchestras of the world.

The personal history of this extraordinarily brilliant man is of unusual interest. His name must be put on the list of child prodigies whose early indications of great gifts have been justified by later performances. Koussevitsky made his professional debut as a conductor in his native city of Tver, Russia, at the age of 11 years. The authority for this statement does not say how long he continued to fill such a post at that period of his development, but to have been permitted to remain on the platform for one whole evening is quite distinction enough.

After that surprising beginning, he continued his musical studies first in Moscow and later in Berlin under Arthur Nikisch. In 1909 he founded his first orchestra and with it toured Russia for several years. At the same time he founded his own musical publishing house. In 1917 he went to Paris and there his publishing firm moved its headquarters after the Russian revolution.

Between 1921 and 1924 he toured Western Europe Boston has engaged his attention since that time except for the period which he devotes to the series of concerts which he gives annually in Paris.

The opportunity to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra in Minnesota is an unusual one, tI is so committed to its large Eastern audience that there is seldom an opportunity for Western tours. The orchestra's schedule of concerts consists of five series in Greater Boston, one in Providence and two in New York. This program is an extraordinarily full one and permits of few excursions.

An interesting item on Koussevitsky's list of talents as conductor, editor, and executive in musical affairs is his gift as a double bass viol player. With the artist's supreme and perfect belief in his instrument he has even composed a concerto for the double bass.

The program which Koussevitsky has chosen for the concert to be given in Cyrus Northrop Auditorium on the University campus reflects some of his own particular musical enthusiasms. It follows.

Concerto Grosso-Opus 6, No. 10, for string orchestra .....Handel
Two Nocturnes—Clouds and Festivals .....Debussy
Second Suite, Daphnis and Chloe—Beethoven
Fifth Symphony .....Beethoven

PRINCIPAL FIGURES IN

Serge Koussevitsky shown above is the very active and d chestra with which he will appear in a concert to be giv Auditorium at the University of Minnesota. Gina Pinne chestra under Mr. Verbrugghen on Thursa

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
STAR
OCT 28

The Boston Symphony

CONCERTGOERS this week are turning their eyes and ears toward the Northrop Memorial auditorium where, on Wednesday night, the renowned Boston Symphony orchestra with its equally renowned conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will appear in its first concert in [redacted].

If all the accounts which have been written of this famous orchestra are true, the concert should prove one of the most momentous and enjoyable of a music season that already is crowded with good things. No less valuable, from the local symphony lover's viewpoint, will be the opportunity it affords for a new perspective on the quality of our own orchestra.

Far-off things often exude a glamour never associated with local phenomena, and the remote Boston Symphony illustrates well the truth that "distance lends enchantment." Minneapolis devotees of music now have a chance to see whether that glamour will survive under the conditions of "here and now" and may experience, in the bargain, a vivid revelation of the value and importance, by the light of comparison, of our home-grown symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS
JOURNAL
OCT 29

Governor to Honor Boston Conductors

Governor and Mrs. Theodore Christian will entertain at a dinner tomorrow evening in honor of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston [redacted] orchestra. Tomorrow afternoon Henri Verbrugghen will give a luncheon in his honor. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the second dedicatory concert at the Cyrus Northrop Memorial Auditorium tomorrow evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MINNEAPOLIS STAR

Boston Symphony in Concert Tonight

The second preliminary dedicatory event at the Cyrus Northrop memorial auditorium at the University of Minnesota will be held tonight when the Boston Symphony orchestra appears in concert. The first event in connection with the dedication was last Tuesday when the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra presented a concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
EVE. TRIBUNE

BEFORE THE CONCERT TO BE given by the Boston Symphony orchestra Wednesday evening in the Cyrus Northrup auditorium at the University of Minnesota Miss Eunice Norton and her parents, Mr. and Mrs. W. I. Norton of the Oak Grove hotel, will be guests of Governor and Mrs. Theodore Christianson at dinner in their home. Mrs. Elbert L. Carpenter of Clifton avenue will be hostess at an informal tea for Miss Norton Friday afternoon. Miss Norton returned to Minneapolis from England to be the piano soloist with the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra at the dedicatory concert in the Northrop auditorium October 22. She will give a radio program with the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra Sunday.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

155

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS STAR
OCT 31

MUSIC

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Symphony in Concert

By JOHN K. SHERMAN

"Veni, vidi, vici" is the message that Serge Koussevitzky may send back, with the unanimous approval of Minneapolis concertgoers, to Bostontown. A hypnotized audience of 5,000 in Northrop auditorium last night surrendered to the Boston Symphony orchestra heart and soul, and left the hall under such a spell that some of them, we don't doubt, are still walking on clouds.

Without giving way to the natural impulse to use superlatives, the Boston symphony under Koussevitzky must be conceded to be a great orchestra, a supremely great orchestra. Its gift to Minneapolis music lovers last evening was revelation of what symphonic music can be—and this is said with no disrespect to our own orchestra. The enjoyment it aroused was of the kind that leaves the concertgoer in an exhausted, inarticulate state, drained dry of emotion and ecstasy.

* * *

First and foremost, the Boston orchestra is a marvelous unit, trained to the finest edge of technical perfection—a single musical instrument that plays as one man might play. No music is so intricate or dazzling that it cannot be elucidated, with overpowering conviction, by the 110 men who make up its personnel. Its choirs are flawless in tone production and each are welded to the other with uncanny precision.

Secondly, Serge Koussevitzky is a controlling genius whose strength and sensitivity and intelligence are everywhere apparent. He is a great clarifier and a great lover, one also feels, of music's sensuous beauty. His interpretations live and breathe; their appeal is so magnetic that the hearers' attention is riveted into an almost painful absorption. His eloquence is so moving that one can hardly restrain the urge to shout and clap strangers on the back at the end of a performance.

* * *

The adroit balance and profound sense of form possessed by Koussevitzky were immediately evident as the first number on the program — Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra, op. 6, No. 10 —got under way. Here was beautiful limpidity of strings, a conception which retained the formal, slightly archaic grace of Handel while breathing into it a glowing and contagious warmth. Here, also, was nuance drawn out to its thinnest line, "listening" silences which broke the skein of sound, a patient sensitiveness which spun measures of bewildering purity and beauty.

In the Debussy which followed, Koussevitzky gave his hearers an inkling of his superb mastery of modern harmonics and rhythms. In "Nuages," a magic spell is induced by the remoteness, the fragrant delicacy of the phrasing—a delicacy which was never weak or uncertain. One marveled that a touch so soft and light could also be so sure and so accurate. In the succeeding "Fetes," the second of the Debussy Nocturnes, the conductor galvanized the seeming softness and pliability of his orchestra into an electrical tension and brilliance and brought the composition to a climax that was all sheen and glitter, like the pattern of gaudy fireworks against a night sky.

* * *

But if the Debussy was magic, the Ravel that followed was sheer sorcery which made hearers doubt the evidence of their ears. Never have we experienced a musical sensation so blindingly vivid as that heard in the finale of the "Daphnis and Chloe" suite. Here the orchestra became white-hot, incandescent, producing an effect which made one wonder, "Is it possible?" For orchestral virtuosity, this composition stood out as the evening's most salient achievement. What might have been confusion and unintelligible complexity in the hands of another was moulded by Koussevitzky into a lyric fired with meaning and eloquence.

Of the Beethoven Fifth symphony, one's praise is also apt to be extravagant. Koussevitzky read the familiar work with fine majesty and free-flowing logic. It was a symphony in which there were mysterious shadows as well as whole-souled affirmations. In generosity of treatment, idealism, and clarity of thought, it was a performance that measured up to the colossal concept of Beethoven.

As encore, after complimenting Minneapolis in delightful English on its new campus auditorium — "the finest in the world" — Koussevitzky further delighted his audience with a brilliant rendition of the scherzo from Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique."

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS
JOURNAL
OCT 31

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY THRILLS AUDIENCE

Koussevitzki and Master Musicians Win High Praise in Campus Concert

By VICTOR NILSSON

Boston Symphony Orchestra under the musical direction of its conductor, Serge Koussevitzki, was the formidable attraction with which the regular concert course of the University of Minnesota filled the second program of dedicatory concerts in the Cyrus Northrop Memorial Auditorium Wednesday night. No wonder there was a capacity house and rich flow of genuine enthusiasm for the occasion. It is seldom a first class orchestra from some other city comes visiting here under the baton of a world famous conductor. The Boston Symphony has not been heard here for well nigh 40 years, or since it appeared under the direction of Arthur Nikisch on May 12, 1890, at the armory of the university (afterwards demolished by fire). It was a memorable event, vivid yet in the minds of all who heard it.

To compare one orchestra with others is not just. It is not even quite fair to compare the work of the same orchestra with such a span of time between the appearances here as 40 years, especially when the difference in size of the organization is considerable. Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the magic wand of Arthur Nikisch, could not with 70 men, even if they were all "great artists" as ran the advertising parlance of those days, play as can the same organization composed of 107 men of the same technical skill and under the hagic wand of an equally great conductor.

Numbers Make Difference

The difference in complement makes a decided difference, not only in the selection of the program, but also in its performance. The increasing wealth and suasion of the strings never ceases to establish itself in proportion to the size of the orchestra of picked musicians. And a smaller complement cannot include such things as an alto flute in G, a base clarinet in E, a fourth trumpet, two harps and double basses with the low C as are required in the Ravel music played Wednesday night. With the complete equipment of a modern symphony orchestra even goes an artistically trained choir of male, female and mixed voices. The suite in questiion calls for a mixed chorus, while of Debussy nocturnes there is a third, "Sirenes," like this time often omitted because it calls for a choir of female voices.

Between the two conductors of the Boston Symphony heard here, it is easier to make comparisons, if comparisons there must be. This is quite natural because they both "travel in the same class" with no other in all the world of quite the same superiority with the exception of three or four. Serge Koussevitski is, like Nikisch, a conductor who turns all the music that he touches into a high degree of intensification. Koussevitski is the Chaliapin among the conductors, and in his vitality goes even farther on the lines of individual vitalization and ecstatic vibrancy than did Nikisch.

Plays Rare Handel Work

The only music played this time by the Boston Symphony that is not familiar to local concertgoers from the repertoire of our Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra was the first on the program or the tenth concerto grosso (in D minor) out of the dozen published by Handel ah his opus 10. It is one of the least often heard of the twelve. The conductor was impressive in his interpretation of this music and inspired his players to virtuosic exertion of finesse. The composer's own performers no doubt were also virtuosic, but in a ryhmically largeness and simplicity, as Handel's music is generally understood also in our day. His conducting was throughout quietly restrained.

The Handel music impressed through the serene and melancholic beauty of its several slow movements and the skilful and romping playfulness of those of lighter mood and higher speed. The group of solo players, which in a concerto grosso of those 200 years ago constitutes what was called the concertina or concertante, was made up for the concertmaster of the orchestra, another violin and a cello, who. when occasion required, rose to prominence and played their difficult music with superior skill and animation.

The two Debussy nocturnes of "Nuages" and "Fetes" that followed held their ground nobly by the side of the Handel music. In the first the great Russian conductor proved what a finished Parisian he is in his demarkation of the exquisite "demiteintes," which constitute the artistic joy of the French. In the festival picture was established the first Koussevitzkian crescendo of tremendous energy and sweep, which made the whole end in an explosion of color provoking a great number of recalls.

Koussevitzki Charms

With the second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," a return was made from the impressionistic world of whole tone progressions, principally at least to the diatonic scale, while striking imitations both of the impressionist Debussy and the expressionist Stravinsky are made in Ravel's own inimitable manner. The whole creation as staged by Fokin and Bakst constitutes one of the most ravishing "clous" of the much slandered grand opera of Paris. As seen and heard there, Ravel's "symphonic choreographique" impresses as the greatest art creation of the twentieth century. Although instrumental parts are engraved in the score to take the places of its marvelous choruses without words, Koussevitzky conjured forth an all too brief section of this wonderful music in an adorable manner. Of infinite charm were made the closing passages of "Lever du jour" for oboe, flute, bass clarinet and solo violin. In "Pantomime," all the bizarrerie of Ravel's refined humor was set at play, while in the "Danse generale" there was another astounding feat of incisive rhythm and gorgeous color riot. New ovations followed this number with renewed and prolonged intensity.

Space forbids the full attention that should be given the performance of Beethoven's C minor symphony, which closed the program. It was throughout a divinely beautiful performance which in no movement knew any exaggeration of tempo or detail and throughout sound, brilliantly virtuosic and soothingly artistic. At the close the enthusiasm knew no bounds and was not stilled until Koussevitzky in a few words complimented the University of Minnesota upon "the most beautiful auditorium in the world," and announced an extra number. This was the racially resplendent scherza from Tchaikovsky's "Symphonie Pathetique," played marvelously by one of the world's greatest orchestras.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS
TRIBUNE

MRS. A. P. KEAM, 916 MARshall avenue, St. Paul, was hostess at a breakfast Tuesday morning at the Commodore hotel in honor of Mrs. Carl J. Lomen (Laura Volstead) of New York and Nome, Alaska. A large lemon-colored pottery bowl filled with yellow and bronze pompon chrysanthemums and pink roses and four single crystal candlesticks with lemon-colored tapers centered the table at which the guests were seated in the new ivory and crystal dining room on the main floor.

The guests included Mmes. Theodore Christianson, S. E. Linsley, Rhey T. Snodgrass, Theodore Veldey, F. W. Bock, Charles K. Blandin and Dudley W. Birdsall. Mr. and Mrs. Lomen are visiting Mrs. Lomen's father, Mr. Andrew J. Volstead, at the Commodore hotel.

Covers were placed for 16 guests at the reindeer dinner Governor and Mrs. Theodore Christianson gave Wednesday evening in their home in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Lomen and Miss Eunice Norton, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. W. I. Norton of the Oak Grove hotel. Following the dinner the party attended the concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Cyrus Northrop auditorium at the University of Minnesota.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS
TRIBUNE
OCT 31

Big Ovation Given Boston Players Here

Kussevitsky, Noted Symphony's Leader, Is Recalled Many Times.

In Short Talks, He Terms Northrop Auditorium Best in World.

Concert Part of Dedication Program Series for New 'U' Hall.

By James Davies.

Kussevitsky and his Boston symphony orchestra will return to the Hub feeling that Minneapolis deserves all the nice things that have been said of it as a musical city.

Certainly no man, much less one so tempermentally and emotionally effulgent as the Boston leader, could fail to feel that the great audience of nearly 5,000 persons attending the concert at the new Cyrus Northrop Memorial auditorium on the University of Minnesota campus Wednesday night, was with him heart and soul as he led his men through the broad dignity of Haendel, the inimitable music of Debussy, the clashing and bewildering compositions of Ravel, the majesty of Beethoven or the scintillating brilliance of Tschaikowsky.

The concert was the second of a series of three programs dedicating the new auditorium.

Conductor Speaks.

There is no doubt about Kussevitsky's own appreciation of the reception given him. He even made a little speech just long enough to tell the audience that the new hall was the finest in thew orld. That was quite enough; for it was what everybody wished to hear. Then he proceeded to break every rule of the organization he leads with such supreme mastery by adding to the program a part of the Tschaikowsky "Pathetic" symphony.

How many times he was recalled during the evening it is impossible to say. After the Ravel numbers I counted up to half a dozen and then wearied. The audience remained long after the program was concluded. It might have been there still, had it been possible to make Mr. Kussevitsky miss his train. They did their best anyway and to a man the orchestra responded.

Forget Tradition.

This is a virtuoso orchestra of 110 men. It is very true of most orchestras that the various leads rank high, but it is doubtful whether any man in this orchestra ranks as low as the average. But even 110 virtuosos could not create effects such as we listened to at this concert under less than a virtuoso leader. Kussevitsky is precisely that. One may disagree with him on minor details sometimes, but it is results that count. For instance the natural intensity of the man rather stirred the stiff old bones of the Haendel concerto for string orchestra to something more vibrant with emotion than I expected.

That is said with no disrespect to Haendel, but with considerably more admiration for Kussevitsky, who paid no attention to tradition and let us feel that perhaps after all I had been doing injustice to the more placid Haendel.

Debussy was a tonal dream or a pair of them, tone color and more shades of it than I dreamed existed resulted from the interpretation of the two nocturnes: "Nuages" and "Fetes." Debussy is made too colorless most of the time, but not at this concert and yet there was never the slightest hint of exaggeration.

156

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS STAR
OCT 31 1923

Boston Artists Leave for Home After Concert

Members of the Boston symphony orchestra were on their way home today after playing a dedicatory concert at Northrop Memorial auditorium at the University of Minnesota and being entertained by members of the Minneapolis symphony orchestra Wednesday.

The Minneapolis musicians acted as a reception and entertainment committee. Many members of both musical organizations renewed old friendships while the Boston visitors were guests on sightseeing trips and luncheons. Henri Verbrugghen, conductor of the Minneapolis orchestra, entertained Serg Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston [redacted] at a luncheon at the Minneapolis club.

The Boston symphony played at the second dedicatory program at Northrop auditorium. Immediately after the concert they entrained for home.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS
TRIBUNE
OCT 31 1923

Symphony From East Welcomed

Boston Orchestra Entertained by Musicians of Minneapolis.

Old friendships were renewed Wednesday when members of the Minneapolis symphony orchestra entertained the visiting Boston symphony. One of the nine new members of the Minneapolis organization saw his father for the first time in several months.

The Boston symphony came to play at the second dedicatory program at Northrop Memorial auditorium at the University of Minnesota Wednesday night. Immediately after the concert, they entrained and started home.

Among the most anxious waiters on the station platform in the morning was Robert Bladet, one of the new Minneapolis members, whose father, George Bladet, plays second flute in the Boston orchestra. Another Minneapolis musician who found many old friends among the Boston visitors was George Grisez, first clarinet. At the age of 19 he was with the Boston symphony, as the youngest member of any symphony orchestra in the country. Those who had helped him make his debut with the Boston symphony were guests at a luncheon at his home.

Conductor met conductor at the Minneapolis club where Henri Verbrugghen, leader of the Minneapolis orchestra, entertained Serg Koussevitzky, the Boston conductor, at a luncheon.

From the time of their arrival until a short time before their concert started, the visitors from Boston were the guests of the Minneapolis musicians, who acted as a reception and entertainment committee. Despite the damp weather, the visitors, between introductions and reminiscences, were taken on sight seeing trips.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. PAUL, MINN.
NEWS
OCT 31 [illegible]

CONCERT ACCLAIMED

Boston Symphony Given Great Reception at "U" Auditorium.

Such an enthusiastic and appreciative reception was given the Boston Symphony orchestra at the University of Minnesota Wednesday evening that two rules of orchestral concerts were broken.

The leader, Serge Koussevitsky made a speech and played an encore number at the close of the regular program when the audience of about 4,500 was reluctant to leave.

In his speech the great Russian conductor said that the Memorial auditorium was one of the finest he had seen in the world. The extra number played by the orchestra was the only Russian music played during the evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS
JOURNAL
OCT 31 [illegible]

CONDUCTOR MEETS CONDUCTOR

BOTH famed orchestra leaders, Serge Koussevitzky, (left) and Henri Verbrugghen met in Minneapolis for the first time yesterday after a 25-year acquaintance as musicians. Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was luncheon guest of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra's leader at the Minneapolis Club. "Know each other?" Mr. Verbrugghen said. "Yes. For 25 years. Through our music. But this is the first time we ever met."

Transcript

itz"; [illegible]
s.

Night in Minneapolis

The returns are not yet all in from the journey westward, last week, of Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra. From the concert in Chicago on Tuesday, they moved northwest for a concert on Wednesday in Minneapolis, unvisited since 1890 in the distant days of Nikisch as conductor. The occasion was not without excitements. Next morning The Minneapolis Tribune reported them, "on the front page" as follows:

Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to the Hub feeling that Minneapolis deserves all the nice things that have been said of it as a musical city.

Continued on Following Page

Certainly no man, much less one so tempermentally and emotionally effulgent as the Boston leader, could fail to feel that the great audience of nearly 5000 persons attending the concert at the new Cyrus Northrop Memorial Auditorium on the University of Minnesota campus Wednesday night, was with him heart and soul as he led his men through the broad dignity of Handel [a Concerto Grosso], the inimitable music of Debussy ["Clouds" and Fêtsel], the clashing and bewildering composition of Ravel [second Suite from "Daphnis and Chloë], the majesty of Beethoven [Fifth Symphony], or the scintillating brilliance of Chaikovsky [March Movement from the "Pathetic" Symphony].

There is no doubt about Koussevitzky's own appreciation of the reception given him. He even made a little speech just long enough to tell the audience that the new hall was the finest in the world. That was quite enough; for it was what everybody wished to hear. Then he proceeded to break every rule of the organization he leads with such supreme mastery by adding to the program a part of the Chaikovsky "Pathetic" Symphony.

How many times he was recalled during the evening it is impossible to say. After the Ravel number I counted up to half a dozen and then wearied. The audience remained long after the program was concluded. It might have been there still, had it been posible to make Mr. Koussevitzky miss his train. They did their best anyway and to a man the orchestra responded.

156

THE MINNEAPOLIS STAR.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1929

MUSIC

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Symphony in Concert

By JOHN K. SHERMAN

"Veni, vidi, vici" is the message that Serge Koussevitzky may send back, with the unanimous approval of Minneapolis concertgoers, to Bostontown. A hypnotized audience of 5,000 in Northrop auditorium last night surrendered to the Boston Symphony orchestra heart and soul, and left the hall under such a spell that some of them, we don't doubt, are still walking on clouds.

Without giving way to the natural impulse to use superlatives, the Boston symphony under Koussevitzky must be conceded to be a great orchestra, a supremely great orchestra. Its gift to Minneapolis music lovers last evening was revelation of what symphonic music can be—and this is said with no disrespect to our own orchestra. The enjoyment it aroused was of the kind that leaves the concertgoer in an exhausted, inarticulate state, drained dry of emotion and ecstasy.

* * *

First and foremost, the Boston orchestra is a marvelous unit, trained to the finest edge of technical perfection—a single musical instrument that plays as one man might play. No music is so intricate or dazzling that it cannot be elucidated, with overpowering conviction, by the 110 men who make up its personnel. Its choirs are flawless in tone production and each are welded to the other with uncanny precision.

Secondly, Serge Koussevitzky is a controlling genius whose strength and sensitivity and intelligence are everywhere apparent. He is a great clarifier and a great lover, one also feels, of music's sensuous beauty. His interpretations live and breathe; their appeal is so magnetic that the hearers' attention is riveted into an almost painful absorption. His eloquence is so moving that one can hardly restrain the urge to shout and clap strangers on the back at the end of a performance.

* * *

The adroit balance and profound sense of form possessed by Koussevitzky were immediately evident as the first number on the program — Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra, op. 6, No. 10 —got under way. Here was beautiful limpidity of strings, a conception which retained the formal, slightly archaic grace of Handel while breathing into it a glowing and contagious warmth. Here, also, was nuance drawn out to its thinnest line, "listening" silences which broke the skein of sound a patient sensitiveness which spun measures of bewildering purity and purity.

In the Debussy which followed, Koussevitzky gave his hearers an inkling of his superb mastery of modern harmonics and rhythms. In "Nuages," a magic spell is induced by the remoteness, the fragrant delicacy of the phrasing—a delicacy which was never weak or uncertain. One marveled that a touch so soft and light could also be so sure and so accurate. In the succeeding "Fetes," the second of the Debussy Nocturnes, the conductor galvanized the seeming softness and pliability of his orchestra into an electrical tension and brilliance and brought the composition to a climax that was all sheen and glitter, like the pattern of gaudy fireworsk against a night sky.

* * *

But if the Debussy was magic, the Ravel that followed was sheer sorcery which made hearers doubt the evidence of their ears. Never have we experienced a musical sensation so blindingly vivid as that heard in the finale of the "Daphnis and Chloe" suite. Here the orchestra became white-hot, incandescent, producing an effect which made one wonder, "Is it possible?" For orchestral virtuosity, this composition stood out as the evening's most salient achievement. What might have been confusion and unintelligible complexity in the hands of another was moulded by Koussevitzky into a lyric fired with meaning and eloquence.

Of the Beethoven Fifth symphony, one's praise is also apt to be extravagant. Koussevitzky read the familiar work with fine majesty and free-flowing logic. It was a symphony in which there were mysterious shadows as well as whole-souled affirmations. In generosity of treatment, idealism, and clarity of thought, it was a performance that measured up to the colossal concept of Beethoven.

As encore, after complimenting in delightful English on its new campus auditorium — "the finest in the world" — Koussevitzky further delighted his audience with a brilliant rendition of the scherzo from Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique."

THE MINNEAPOLIS JOURNAL

October 31, 1929.

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY THRILLS AUDIENCE

Koussevitzki and Master Musicians Win High Praise in Campus Concert

By VICTOR NILSSON

Boston Symphony Orchestra under the musical direction of its conductor, Serge Koussevitzki, was the formidable attraction with which the regular concert course of the University of Minnesota filled the second program of dedicatory concerts in the Cyrus Northrop Memorial Auditorium Wednesday night. No wonder there was a capacity house and rich flow of genuine enthusiasm for the occasion. It is seldom a first class orchestra from some other city comes visiting here under the baton of a world famous conductor. The Boston Symphony has not been heard here for well nigh 40 years, or since it appeared under the direction of Arthur Nikisch on May 12, 1890, at the armory of the university (afterwards demolished by fire). It was a memorable event, vivid yet in the minds of all who heard it.

To compare one orchestra with others is not just. It is not even quite fair to compare the work of the same orchestra with such a span of time between the appearances here as 40 years, especially when the difference in size of the organization is considerable. Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the magic wand of Arthur Nikisch, could not with 70 men, even if they were all "great artists" as ran the advertising parlance of those days, play as can the same organization composed of 107 men of the same technical skill and under the hagic wand of an equally great conductor.

Numbers Make Difference

The difference in complement makes a decided difference, not only in the selection of the program, but also in its performance. The increasing wealth and suasion of the strings never ceases to establish itself in proportion to the size of the orchestra of picked musicians. And a smaller complement cannot include such things as an alto flute in G, a base clarinet in E, a fourth trumpet, two harps and double basses with the low C as are required in the Ravel music played Wednesday night. With the complete equipment of a modern symphony orchestra even goes an artistically trained choir of male, female and mixed voices. The suite in questiion calls for a mixed chorus, while of Debussy nocturnes there is a third, "Sirenes," like this time often omitted because it calls for a choir of female voices.

Between the two conductors of the Boston Symphony heard here, it is easier to make comparisons, if comparisons there must be. This is quite natural because they both "travel in the same class" with no other in all the world of quite the same superiority with the exception of three or four. Serge Koussevitski is, like Nikisch, a conductor who turns all the music that he touches into a high degree of intensification. Koussevitski is the Chaliapin among the conductors, and in his vitality goes even farther on the lines of individual vitalization and ecstatic vibrancy than did Nikisch.

Plays Rare Handel Work

The only music played this time by the Boston Symphony that is not familiar to local concertgoers from the repertoire of our Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra was the first on the program or the tenth concerto grosso (in D minor) out of the dozen published by Handel ah his opus 10. It is one of the least often heard of the twelve. The conductor was impressive in his interpretation of this music and inspired his players to virtuosic exertion of finesse. The composer's own performers no doubt were also virtuosic, but in a ryhmically largeness and simplicity, as Handel's music is generally understood also in our day. His conducting was throughout quietly restrained.

The Handel music impressed through the serene and melancholic beauty of its several slow movements and the skilful and romping playfulness of those of lighter mood and higher speed. The group of solo players, which in a concerto grosso of those 200 years ago constitutes what was called the concertina or concertante, was made up for the concertmaster of the orchestra, another violin and a cello, who, when occasion required, rose to prominence and played their difficult music with superior skill and animation.

The two Debussy nocturnes of "Nuages" and "Fetes" that followed held their ground nobly by the side of the Handel music. In the first the great Russian conductor proved what a finished Parisian he is in his demarkation of the exquisite "demiteintes," which constitute the artistic joy of the French. In the festival picture was established the first Koussevitzkian crescendo of tremendous energy and sweep, which made the whole end in an explosion of color provoking a great number of recalls.

Koussevitzki Charms

With the second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," a return was made from the impressionistic world of whole tone progressions, principally at least to the diatonic scale, while striking imitations both of the impressionist Debussy and the expressionist Stravinsky are made in Ravel's own inimitable manner. The whole creation as staged by Fokin and Bakst constitutes one of the most ravishing "clous" of the much slandered grand opera of Paris. As seen and heard there, Ravel's "symphonic choreographique" impresses as the greatest art creation of the twentieth century. Although instrumental parts are engraved in the score to take the places of its marvelous choruses without words, Koussevitzky conjured forth an all too brief section of this wonderful music in an adorable manner. Of infinite charm were made the closing passages of "Lever du jour" for oboe, flute, bass clarinet and solo violin. In "Pantomime," all the bizarrerie of Ravel's refined humor was set at play, while in the "Danse generale" there was another astounding feat of incisive rhythm and gorgeous color riot. New ovations followed this number with renewed and prolonged intensity.

Space forbids the full attention that should be given the performance of Beethoven's C minor symphony, which closed the program. It was throughout a divinely beautiful performance which in no movement knew any exaggeration of tempo or detail and throughout sound, brilliantly virtuosic and soothingly artistic. At the close the enthusiasm knew no bounds and was not stilled until Koussevitzky in a few words complimented the University of Minnesota upon "the most beautiful auditorium in the world," and announced an extra number. This was the racially resplendent scherza from Tchaikovsky's "Symphonie Pathetique," played marvelously by one of the world's greatest orchestras.

PROVIDENCE

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS
NOV 1 - 1928

WHAT MUSIC COSTS

The Christian Science Monitor has published some facts of interest to music lovers in this city who think they are overcharged when the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes here. It says:

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra has opened its season with an appeal for $145,000. This represents an estimated deficit for this season of $100,000, and $45,000 remaining of a deficit of $145,000 for the season of 1928-29. The comparative statement made public by the trustees shows a large increase in the deficit, which in 1927 was $44,000 and in 1928, $87,000.

"Receipts have decreased, chiefly because of a falling off in income from concerts and from rentals of Symphony Hall. The Beethoven Festival of 1927 and radiocasting of programs in 1927 and 1928 swelled the receipts for those years. Neither source of revenue was available last season. Payments have increased, chiefly because of increases in orchestra salaries. For this season, prices have been slightly raised.

"All the concerts are subscribed. But in order to fill all seats at all concerts, it is necessary to have a famous conductor. Famous conductors cost money. If you try to operate with a less famous conductor, at a smaller salary, there are vacant seats. It is very difficult to economize.

"San Francisco has found it so. Alfred Hertz has been conductor of the San Francisco Orchestra for fourteen years. He is a distinguished musician, with a long record as symphonic and operatic conductor. But attendance at his concerts was falling off. He has resigned. San Francisco wanted Bruno Walter to succeed him. Mr. Walter doubtless would draw full houses at all concerts. But Mr. Walter's salary would be very high. He has not been engaged."

Thus it would seem that when we get any famous orchestra here, we pay nothing like the cost of its performance. That is not a condition which reflects creditably on the wealthy people of Providence.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS

STUDENTS TO RECEIVE CARDS FOR SYMPHONY

Student cards for the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence are to be distributed, as in former years, by the Rhode Island Federation of Music Clubs. The cards, which are redeemable for seats on the day of each concert, may be obtained from the student seat committee, Miss Evangeline Larry, 98 Waterman street, from 2 to 6 p. m., or Mrs. Agnes Coutanche Burke, Chopin Club studio, Caesar Misch building, from 9 to 10 a. m. during the week of Nov. 11.

Student cards may be held by Rhode Island music students under 25 years on recommendation of their teachers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

Student Cards for Symphony Concerts

Student cards for the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence may be secured by students of music, upon recommendation of their music teacher, from Miss Evangeline Larry at 98 Waterman street, or from Mrs. Agnes Coutanche Burke at the Chopin Club Studio, Caesar Misch building, during the week of Nov. 11.

Student cards are secured to students of music through the Rhode Island State Federation of Music Clubs.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

Boston Symphony Season Opens Nov. 19

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Providence season Nov. 19th, a week from next Tuesday, in the Albee Theatre. The remaining concerts will take place on Dec. 17, Jan. 21 and April 1st.

The present season is the 49th of the famous orchestra, and the sixth under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Its success to date has been extraordinary. In the week of October 27th, the orchestra made its annual Western tour, travelling West as far as Chicago, and also playing in Buffalo, Minneapolis, Indianapolis and Pittsburgh. There were great audiences and remarkable demonstrations in each city visited.

A few places in the balconies have been released by former subscribers and these will be placed on sale for the season at Steiner's to-morrow. It seems likely that these will all be subscribed by the season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS

ORCHESTRA TO GIVE NOVELTY NEXT TUESDAY

Next Tuesday evening in the Albee Theatre at 8:15 the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first concert of the Providence season. This is the 49th season of the orchestra and the sixth under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky.

Dr. Koussvitzky will present for this occasion Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont" and the same composer's Symphony No. 5 in C minor. A notable humorous score, often regarded as the masterpiece of Richard Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," is also on the program. A novelty will be Louis Gruenberg's symphonic poem, "The Enchanted Isle."

Gruenberg's "Enchanted Isle" had its first performance at the Worcester festival this season, and was introduced by Dr. Koussevitzky in Boston Nov. 8 and 9. The composer divulges that this is one of a series of four tone poems conceived during the World war, buth recently scored. Gruenberg, a native of Russia, now lives in Brooklyn, N. Y. He is particularly known by his "Daniel Jazz." Other works, "Creation" and "Jazz Suite," are announced for early performance in this country.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 3 1928

The Fall's First Symphonic Fare

Koussevitzky Returns With Much Beethoven and Two Latter Day Tone Poems, One by R. Strauss, the Other Gruenberg's Prize-Winner

With the exception of a single number, the first Providence program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, for the season 1929-1930 at the Albee Theatre, next Tuesday evening, is familiar to all who attend the symphony concerts. But "The Enchanted Isle" is one of the very latest of enchantments, having had its world-premiere in Boston last week under Dr. Koussevitzky; and so, perhaps, we are particularly fortunate in being able to hear it in this city a fortnight after its formal nativity.

An interesting story surrounds this double-prize work, we are told, for it won a cash prize in the Schubert Centennial contest, as a tribute to the master of melody. It will be remembered that originally this Schubert contest explored the possibility of finishing Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, but the musical world rebelled at the conception, and the terms were changed to make it a composition for works in a romantic vein suitable for commemorating the centennial of Franz Schubert. In his tribute Louis Gruenberg "returned for retrospect to the melodic colors of romanticism and has written a brilliantly scored work."

"Louis Gruenberg" says the Julliard Foundation, "is one of the outstanding figures in the modernist group of America and has been prominently identified with the League of Composers and their concerts which offer a first hearing to talented American composers." His "Daniel Jazz" and "Creation" have been the subject of much discussion and have been frequently played. Their combination of folk-material and jazz patterns are ultra-modern, and his mastery of orchestral form derives from his studies with Busoni, it is said.

Bostonian Salt

The Boston Transcript for Saturday last takes the composition with its grain of salt. H. T. P. remarks: "Mr. Gruenberg's new tone-poem, 'Enchanted Isle,' containing nearly everything in the common stock of music, did deploy orotund movements. They were not many nor were they over driven.

"The 'common stock of music' is common phrase among reviewers in these days. By it they mean the procedures and idiosyncracies of highly individualized modern composers—say Wagner, Strauss, Debussy, or Sibelius—that have gradually become a common fund of matter and method. From it less endowed successors daily draw.

"From it, in particular, Mr. Gruenberg drew liberally and steadily as he composed his tone-poem of the Enchanted Isle. It abounds with everything that the listener can remember; while the original and veritable Gruenberg is hard to discover.

"And what a manifold, inexhaustible toy for such a composer, looking up from the stock-pot, is a modern virtuoso-orchestra! He can caress or he can whip it; try out the choirs and separate instruments, bring off this stroke or that for its own sake; dash in color; clothe king-like a singing theme that in itself is no better than a little naked boy; touch in and toss off—all for instant impression.

And Bostonian Fervor

"What a game it is!! How Mr. Gruenberg enjoyed it! And Dr. Koussevitsky. The audience as well. Long and loud it clapped a modest, and maybe slightly surprised, composer, while the conductor beamed and beckoned.....It takes all sorts of compositions to make a program."

Beethoven's music to Goethe's "Egmont" was composed in 1810, and published in 1811. It had no Juilliard Musical Foundation to underwrite the publication, nor is there any record that its premiere made any stir. In fact we are told that no allusion was made at the time anywhere to Beethoven's "Egmont."

But although it is not as we are told Mr. Gruenberg's piece is, "de rebus omnibus et quibusdam aliis," we can look forward to a pleasure in the

"Music centred in a doleful song
Steaming up a lamentation and an ancient tale of wrong."

Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, that smack of antique rascality, in Rondo Form for full orchestra, whatever they signify, always please. Taken with the concentrated frivolity of the young or the casual attention of the old, they make us sure that the merry rogue was Richard Strauss, mocking at his hereditary enemy, Death.

The Veteran Fifth

In the presence of a work like the C Minor Symphony of Beethoven, one realizes at once the inadequacy or the utter futility of words. Beethoven is the greatest of all the musicians when it is a matter of suggesting what cannot be concealed, yet cannot all be expressed, so it borders on vanity to try to explain what his music means to say.

Those who insist on a program will find old Schindler's "So Fate knocks at the door" as suggestive as anything else. Nohl thinks that the symphony is "the musical Faust of the moral will and its conflicts; a work whose progress shows that there is something greater than Fate, namely Man, who, descending into the abysses of his own self, fetches counsel and power wherewith to battle with life; and then, reinforced through his conviction of indestructible oneness with the godlike, celebrates, with dithyrambic victory, the triumph of the eternal God, and of his own inner freedom." Or if he will:

"The rhythmic anguish of growth,
and the motion of mutable things.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

PART ONE

I. Beethoven.....
.....Overture to "Egmont"
II. Gruenberg.....
......"The Enchanted Isle"
III. Strauss.....
"Till Eulenspiegel's lustige Streiche"

PART TWO

Beethoven.Symphony No. 5 in C minor

Of Love that longs and is loth,
and plume-plucked Hope without wings,
Passions and pains without number, and life that runs and is lame,
From slumber again to slumber, the same race set for the same,
Where the runners outwear each other, but running with lampless hands
No man takes light from his brother till blind at the goal he stands."

Or this:

"Things are cruel and blind; their strength detains and deforms:
And the wearying wings of the

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give its first concert of the Providence season in the Albee Theatre, Providence, next Tuesday evening at 8:15. This is the 49th season of the great orchestra and the sixth under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky.

Dr. Koussevitzky will present for this occasion Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont," and the same composer's master symphony, No. 5 in C minor. A notable humorous score, often considered the masterpiece of Richard Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," is also upon the programme. A notable novelty will be Louis Gruenberg's symphonic poem, "The Enchanted Isle."

Gruenberg's "Enchanted Isle" had its first performance at the Worcester festival this season, and was

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

Beethoven Given First and Last Places on Symphony Concert

Written for the Sunday Journal
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At the beginning of the present season Dr. Koussevitzky, as he is now called in recognition of the honorary degree conferred upon him by Brown and Harvard Universities, declared unofficially his intention of giving to the same composer the first and the last place on each of his first three Boston programs. Only in the opening program, however, did he hold to this unconventional scheme. Upon that list, as upon the one he has planned for the concert in the Albee Theatre here next Tuesday evening, he placed as opening number Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont" and as the concluding piece his Fifth Symphony. In this instance, at least, the arrangement proved an effective one, although undoubtedly Beethoven better than most composers can bear such emphasis.

His Fifth Symphony, sketches for which had been made six or seven years before, was completed by Beethoven in 1807, and he wrote the Overture and incidental music to Goethe's play of "Egmont" early in 1810. Thus do both works belong, not only to what is loosely called their composer's second style, but to the same phase of his development. There is even a spiritual kinship between them. In both pieces is the composer's style singularly forthright, spare, two-fisted. Beethoven has here dispensed with superfluities; his themes are concise, their development terse. Compared with both the Third Symphony and the Ninth, the Fifth is a trenchant and economical music. Indeed, the first movement of the Fifth Symphony is the arch-type and model of epigrammatic symphonic writing, and the main body of the "Egmont" Overture, if not so obviously hewn from a single block, is hardly less concise, straightforward and to the point.

This, too, was Beethoven's dramatic period. Within half a decade came the opera "Leonora," afterwards called "Fidelio," the noble third "Leonora" Overture and the Overture to Collin's tragedy, "Coriolanus." And no less than opera and overtures is the Fifth Symphony a dramatic music. Berlioz declared the first movement "the rage of an Othello." The Scherzo has a sinister flavor and its trio, too, with its rough play of double-basses and 'cellos. Likewise dramatic is the celebrated crescendo that links the rapturous close of this movement with the sonorous affirmation of the Finale and again dramatic is the interruption of the latter's movement's triumphal progress by the brief recurrence of the former.

Well may Beethoven have had in mind a program for the Fifth Symphony. The Overture to "Egmont" tells the story of Spain's oppression of the Netherlands, of a hero's doom and final glorification.

Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," the third piece of the evening, tells in tones a tale out of German legend. And the remaining number, Louis Gruenberg's "The Enchanted Isle," has, if not a story to unfold, at least a poetic background.

In the long run of course, program music must stand or fall according to its musical validity. Its poetic content will not keep it alive, nor will its music live even viewed in the light of that program if the music itself fails to stir. Many a once-esteemed symphonic poem of the last 30 or 40 years has fallen by the wayside, but those of Strauss hold their place by reason of their intrinsic musical qualities. And of none of them is this more true than of "Till Eulenspiegel." Call the piece a Scherzo for orchestra with introduction and postlude and it will please very nearly as well, while few symphonic movements better satisfy the listener's sense of musical logic.

Mr. Gruenberg, who was born in Russia 46 years ago, was brought to this country in infancy. As a composer he has distinguished himself in various musical forms, his outstanding achievement being his setting for voice and chamber orchestra of Vachel Lindsay's "Daniel Jazz." "The Enchanted Isle" of Tuesday's concert is a relatively youthful work which the composer not long ago revised. It was first heard at the Worcester, Mass., Festival of last month and was subsequently played by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston. No definite island of fact or of legend inspired the composer. Rather his music is pure fantasy.

PROVIDENCE CRITICISMS - 157

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS

WHAT MUSIC COSTS

The Christian Science Monitor has published some facts of interest to music lovers in this city who think they are overcharged when the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes here. It says:

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra has opened its season with an appeal for $145,000. This represents an estimated deficit for this season of $100,000, and $45,000 remaining of a deficit of $145,000 for the season of 1928-29. The comparative statement made public by the trustees shows a large increase in the deficit, which in 1927 was $44,000 and in 1928, $87,000.

"Receipts have decreased, chiefly because of a falling off in income from concerts and from rentals of Symphony Hall. The Beethoven Festival of 1927 and radiocasting of programs in 1927 and 1928 swelled the receipts for those years. Neither source of revenue was available last season. Payments have increased, chiefly because of increases in orchestra salaries. For this season, prices have been slightly raised.

"All the concerts are subscribed. But in order to fill all seats at all concerts, it is necessary to have a famous conductor. Famous conductors cost money. If you try to operate with a less famous conductor, at a smaller salary, there are vacant seats. It is very difficult to economize.

"San Francisco has found it so. Alfred Hertz has been conductor of the San Francisco Orchestra for fourteen years. He is a distinguished musician, with a long record as symphonic and operatic conductor. But attendance at his concerts was falling off. He has resigned. San Francisco wanted Bruno Walter to succeed him. Mr. Walter doubtless would draw full houses at all concerts. But Mr. Walter's salary would be very high. He has not been engaged."

Thus it would seem that when we get any famous orchestra here, we pay nothing like the cost of its performance. That is not a condition which reflects creditably on the wealthy people of Providence.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS

STUDENTS TO RECEIVE CARDS FOR SYMPHONY

Student cards for the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence are to be distributed, as in former years, by the Rhode Island Federation of Music Clubs. The cards, which are redeemable for seats on the day of each concert, may be obtained from the student seat committee, Miss Evangeline Larry, 98 Waterman street, from 2 to 6 p. m., or Mrs. Agnes Coutanche Burke, Chopin Club studio, Caesar Misch building, from 9 to 10 a. m. during the week of Nov. 11.

Student cards may be held by Rhode Island music students under 25 years on recommendation of their teachers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

Student Cards for Symphony Concerts

Student cards for the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence may be secured by students of music, upon recommendation of their music teacher, from Miss Evangeline Larry at 98 Waterman street, or from Mrs. Agnes Coutanche Burke at the Chopin Club Studio, Caesar Misch building, during the week of Nov. 11.

Student cards are secured to students of music through the Rhode Island State Federation of Music Clubs.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston Symphony Season Opens Nov. 19

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Providence season Nov. 19th, a week from next Tuesday, in the Albee Theatre. The remaining concerts will take place on Dec. 17, Jan. 21 and April 1st.

The present season is the 49th of the famous orchestra, and the sixth under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Its success to date has been extraordinary. In the week of October 27th, the orchestra made its annual Western tour, travelling West as far as Chicago, and also playing in Buffalo, Minneapolis, Indianapolis and Pittsburgh. There were great audiences and remarkable demonstrations in each city visited.

A few places in the balconies have been released by former subscribers and these will be placed on sale for the season at Steinert's to-morrow. It seems likely that these will all be subscribed by the season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS

ORCHESTRA TO GIVE NOVELTY NEXT TUESDAY

Next Tuesday evening in the Albee Theatre at 8:15 the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first concert of the Providence season. This is the 49th season of the orchestra and the sixth under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky.

Dr. Koussvitzky will present for this occasion Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont" and the same composer's Symphony No. 5 in C minor. A notable humorous score, often regarded as the masterpiece of Richard Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," is also on the program. A novelty will be Louis Gruenberg's symphonic poem, "The Enchanted Isle."

Gruenberg's "Enchanted Isle" had its first performance at the Worcester festival this season, and was introduced by Dr. Koussevitzky in Boston Nov. 8 and 9. The composer divulges that this is one of a series of four tone poems conceived during the World war, buth recently scored. Gruenberg, a native of Russia, now lives in Brooklyn, N. Y. He is particularly known by his "Daniel Jazz." Other works, "Creation" and "Jazz Suite," are announced for early performance in this country.

Symphonic Fare

Much Beethoven and Two Tone Poems, One by R. Strauss, the Other Gruenberg's Prize-Winner

With the exception of a single number, the first Providence program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, for the season 1929-1930 at the Albee Theatre, next Tuesday evening, is familiar to all who attend the symphony concerts. But "The Enchanted Isle" is one of the very latest of enchantments, having had its world-premiere in Boston last week under Dr. Koussevitzky; and so, perhaps, we are particularly fortunate in being able to hear it in this city a fortnight after its formal nativity.

An interesting story surrounds this double-prize work, we are told, for it won a cash prize in the Schubert Centennial contest, as a tribute to the master of melody. It will be remembered that originally this Schubert contest explored the possibility of finishing Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, but the musical world rebelled at the conception, and the terms were changed to make it a composition for works in a romantic vein suitable for commemorating the centennial of Franz Schubert. In his tribute Louis Gruenberg "returned for retrospect to the melodic colors of romanticism and has written a brilliantly scored work."

"Louis Gruenberg" says the Julliard Foundation, "is one of the outstanding figures in the modernist group of America and has been prominently identified with the League of Composers and their concerts which offer a first hearing to talented American composers." His "Daniel Jazz" and "Creation" have been the subject of much discussion and have been frequently played. Their combination of folk-material and jazz patterns are ultra-modern, and his mastery of orchestral form derives from his studies with Busoni, it is said.

Bostonian Salt

The Boston Transcript for Saturday last takes the composition with its grain of salt. H. T. P. remarks: "Mr. Gruenberg's new tone-poem, 'Enchanted Isle,' containing nearly everything in the common stock of music, did deploy orotund movements. They were not many nor were they over driven.

"The 'common stock of music' is common phrase among reviewers in these days. By it they mean the procedures and idiosyncracies of highly individualized modern composers—say Wagner, Strauss, Debussy, or Sibelius—that have gradually become a common fund of matter and method. From it less endowed successors daily draw.

"From it, in particular, Mr. Gruenberg drew liberally and steadily as he composed his tone-poem of the Enchanted Isle. It abounds with everything that the listener can remember; while the original and veritable Gruenberg is hard to discover.

"And what a manifold, inexhaustible toy for such a composer, looking up from the stock-pot, is a modern virtuoso-orchestra! He can caress or he can whip it; try out the choirs and separate instruments, bring off this stroke or that for its own sake; dash in color; clothe king-like a singing theme that in itself is no better than a little naked boy; touch in and toss off—all for instant impression.

And Bostonian Fervor

"What a game it is!! How Mr. Gruenberg enjoyed it! And Dr. Koussevitsky. The audience as well. Long and loud it clapped a modest, and maybe slightly surprised, composer, while the conductor beamed and beckoned.....It takes all sorts of compositions to make a program."

Beethoven's music to Goethe's "Egmont" was composed in 1810, and published in 1811. It had no Juilliard Musical Foundation to underwrite the publication, nor is there any record that its premiere made any stir. In fact we are told that no allusion was made at the time anywhere to Beethoven's "Egmont."

But although it is not as we are told Mr. Gruenberg's piece is, "de rebus omnibus et quibusdam aliis," we can look forward to a pleasure in the

"Music centred in a doleful song
Steaming up a lamentation and an ancient tale of wrong."

Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, that smack of antique rascality, in Rondo Form for full orchestra, whatever they signify, always please. Taken with the concentrated frivolity of the young or the casual attention of the old, they make us sure that the merry rogue was Richard Strauss, mocking at his hereditary enemy, Death.

The Veteran Fifth

In the presence of a work like the C Minor Symphony of Beethoven, one realizes at once the inadequacy or the utter futility of words. Beethoven is the greatest of all the musicians when it is a matter of suggesting what cannot be concealed, yet cannot all be expressed, so it borders on vanity to try to explain what his music means to say.

Those who insist on a program will find old Schindler's "So Fate knocks at the door" as suggestive as anything else. Nohl thinks that the symphony is "the musical Faust of the moral will and its conflicts; a work whose progress shows that there is something greater than Fate, namely Man, who, descending into the abysses of his own self, fetches counsel and power wherewith to battle with life; and then, reinforced through his conviction of indestructible oneness with the godlike, celebrates, with dithyrambic victory, the triumph of the eternal God, and of his own inner freedom." Or if he will:

"The rhythmic anguish of growth,
and the motion of mutable things.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

PART ONE

I. Beethoven.....Overture to "Egmont"
II. Gruenberg.....The Enchanted Isle"
III. Strauss.....
"Till Eulenspiegel's lustige Streiche"

PART TWO

Beethoven Symphony No. 5 in C minor

Of Love that longs and is loth,
and plume-plucked Hope without wings,
Passions and pains without number, and life that runs and is lame,
From slumber again to slumber, the same race set for the same,
Where the runners outwear each other, but running with lampless hands
No man takes light from his brother till blind at the goal he stands."

Or this:

"Things are cruel and blind; their strength detains and deforms;
And the wearying wings of the mind still beat up the stream of their storms."

...dence, next Tues...
This is the 49th season of the ... orchestra and the sixth under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky.

Dr. Koussevitzky will present for this occasion Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont," and the same composer's master symphony, No. 5 in C minor. A notable humorous score, often considered the masterpiece of Richard Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," is also upon the programme. A notable novelty will be Louis Gruenberg's symphonic poem, "The Enchanted Isle."

Gruenberg's "Enchanted Isle" had its first performance at the Worcester festival this season, and was introduced by Dr. Koussevitzy in Boston on Nov. 8. The composer divulges that this is one of a series of four tone poems conceived during the World war period, but recently scored.

n First and Last ... on Symphony Concert

Written for the Sunday Journal
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At the beginning of the present season Dr. Koussevitzky, as he is now called in recognition of the honorary degree conferred upon him by Brown and Harvard Universities, declared unofficially his intention of giving to the same composer the first and the last place on each of his first three Boston programs. Only in the opening program, however, did he hold to this unconventional scheme. Upon that list, as upon the one he has planned for the concert in the Albee Theatre here next Tuesday evening, he placed as opening number Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont" and as the concluding piece his Fifth Symphony. In this instance, at least, the arrangement proved an effective one, although undoubtedly Beethoven better than most composers can bear such emphasis.

His Fifth Symphony, sketches for which had been made six or seven years before, was completed by Beethoven in 1807, and he wrote the Overture and incidental music to Goethe's play of "Egmont" early in 1810. Thus do both works belong, not only to what is loosely called their composer's second style, but to the same phase of his development. There is even a spiritual kinship between them. In both pieces is the composer's style singularly forthright, spare, two-fisted. Beethoven has here dispensed with superfluities; his themes are concise, their development terse. Compared with both the Third Symphony and the Ninth, the Fifth is a trenchant and economical music. Indeed, the first movement of the Fifth Symphony is the arch-type and model of epigrammatic symphonic writing, and the main body of the "Egmont" Overture, if not so obviously hewn from a single block, is hardly less concise, straightforward and to the point.

This, too, was Beethoven's dramatic period. Within half a decade came the opera "Leonora," afterwards called "Fidelio," the noble third "Leonora" Overture and the Overture to Collin's tragedy, "Coriolanus." And no less than opera and overtures is the Fifth Symphony a dramatic music. Berlioz declared the first movement "the rage of an Othello." The Scherzo has a sinister flavor and its trio, too, with its rough play of double-basses and 'cellos. Likewise dramatic is the celebrated crescendo that links the rapturous close of this movement with the sonorous affirmation of the Finale and again dramatic is the interruption of the latter's movement's triumphal progress by the brief recurrence of the former.

Well may Beethoven have had in mind a program for the Fifth Symphony. The Overture to "Egmont" tells the story of Spain's oppression of the Netherlands, of a hero's doom and final glorification.

Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," the third piece of the evening, tells in tones a tale out of German legend. And the remaining number, Louis Gruenberg's "The Enchanted Isle," has, if not a story to unfold, at least a poetic background.

In the long run of course, program music must stand or fall according to its musical validity. Its poetic content will not keep it alive, nor will its music live even viewed in the light of that program if the music itself fails to stir. Many a once-esteemed symphonic poem of the last 30 or 40 years has fallen by the wayside, but those of Strauss hold their place by reason of their intrinsic musical qualities. And of none of them is this more true than of "Till Eulenspiegel." Call the piece a Scherzo for orchestra with introduction and postlude and it will please very nearly as well, while few symphonic movements better satisfy the listener's sense of musical logic.

Mr. Gruenberg, who was born in Russia 46 years ago, was brought to this country in infancy. As a composer he has distinguished himself in various musical forms, his outstanding achievement being his setting for voice and chamber orchestra of Vachel Lindsay's "Daniel Jazz." "The Enchanted Isle" of Tuesday's concert is a relatively youthful work which the composer not long ago revised. It was first heard at the Worcester, Mass., Festival of last month and was subsequently played by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston. No definite island of fact or of legend inspired the composer. Rather his music is pure fantasy.

158

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

Serge Koussevitzky
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Which Opens Its Providence Season Tuesday Night in Albee Theatre—from a silhouette by H. D. Wetherbee.

The Fifth Symphony for Our First

A Beethoven Backbone Gives Koussevitzky His Chance as the Boston Symphony Season Opens.—A New American Poem and Strauss's Pranks

It was pleasant last evening to see again the familiar faces of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its distinguished director, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, and hear once more the well-known strains of our old familiar friend, the C Minor Symphony, the sharp laughter of our old acquaintance, Till Eulenspiegel, and the new stories of our young acquaintance of the Enchanted Isle.

Perhaps it was the latter that attracted us most, for ever since the days of Homer —and the Enchanted Isle goes back to him—it has been the peculiar characteristic of audiences to welcome ever the song that is newest. Pindar tells us that it was the same in his day, with perhaps a note of satire in his voice; and here today we demand with the same insistence fresh songs to relieve the tedium of the old.

We have never heard the orchestra perform with more fire or more elan. It was a performance con brio throughout. There was a fluency and luminosity in the playing that at times suggested the high places up in the cold blue sky; and again a pitting of instrument against instrument in a struggle that suggested body against body and curse against curse, with all the clangor and uproar of the pit. Storm and strife, calm and serene sunshine, sweet deception, malignant plotting, mixed with the shrieking, demoniac laughter that breaks in sardonic scorn from the sky spread over a Paradise of Fools. Which was best and which worst is purely a matter of personal taste and preference.

The Standard Works

Musicians of whatever taste never weary of Beethoven. Each repetition brings them something never noticed before. So it was last night. There was a shifting of color in the reeds, an altered glow in the strings, an unwonted fulness in the brass, an unsuspected sting in a note hitherto believed guileless-one and all making him as subtle and elusive as the clouds that roll up from the horizon and change without rest before the wind.

He is the old Cloud-Compeller, mighty, insistent, but withal tolerant, as a god should be. He rouses us to aspire and he lays us in the dust; he jeers at our infirmity and he raises a paean that makes us strong. Where is there another such as he?

But for all that, there seemed to be lacking a certain tenderness that so often walks in Beethoven's music hand in hand with nobility of soul. There was force in abundance, mysticism, impetuosity (perhaps at times a little too much), but the tender grace of a day that is dead, that Beethoven loved so well to contemplate, only to dash it in the dust in one of his cynical outbursts, does not always make itself manifest in the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at least when it plays here. Perhaps the mood is akin to the sublime in literature and is not given to every orchestra to express.

The Fresh Gruenberg

And "The Enchanted Isle"—how new and how old! Modern self-confidence of treatment, and modern dearth of native composition material. Why bother about enchantment when the very idea is now discarded along with the witches and demons, and the devils that have long been cast out? Why meddle with Ulysses and Calypso on their magic isle, or Ulysses and Circe in their magic Schweinerei, and pretend to make from these something new?

The Greeks had a word which they used with no intention of compliment—to Phrygianize—which in music and poetry was synonymous with poor judgment and questionable taste. That is what so many modern composers and quasi-composers are doing today; they are Phrygianizing the little jewels and gems inherited from their ancestors, giving them a new costume-setting.

Their music is not the music that will either make us laugh or weep. They are pretty things that we take in our hands and examine and turn this way and that only to throw away. Like insects they live their little day and die.

The Way of the New Man

Of course we know that all this and worse was said of Beethoven, Schumann, Wagner and the rest; but those worthies at least seemed to advance the kingdom of music; they made their characters walk the fields of the Epic or the boards of Tragedy; now when a new character comes on, we wonder whether to look for him in Rabelais, Gulliver's Travels, or the Isle of the Penguins.

But Till Eulenspiegel is a different matter. Last night he seemed deeply rooted in the soil, a rare combination of Aristophanes in his most malignant moments and Browning in a peculiarly crabbed mood; and perhaps, like those two, his mood was a mere affectation, a parody of backwoods wit assumed for those who know what to laugh at, while it provided righteous indignation for those who had no clue or lacked the fundamental sense of humor so necessary for all who are to enter into the spirit of the piece.

Beyond a doubt the orchestra made it acrid and bitter enough, but it was deft enough in its drawings to blot out the sketches before we realized fully whether they were of Caliban or the Sirens; which we take to be skill of a very high order. M. C. W.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Beethoven—
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op.84

Gruenberg—
"The Enchanted Isle," Symphonic Poem

Strauss—
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," after the Old-fashioned, Roguish Manner,—in Rondo Form, Op. 28.

Beethoven—
Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67
I. Allegro con brio
II. Andante con moto
III. Allegro; Trio
IV. Allegro

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

Boston Symphony Concerts Opened in Albee Theatre

Koussevitzky Plays Two Beethoven Numbers and One Novelty.

Once again the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens a course of concerts in Providence, and once again its splendid music is presented under the guidance of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The first of the season's concerts was played last evening in the Albee Theatre, with the usual audience, comprising music lovers from all parts of Rhode Island and Massachusetts, completely filing the large playhouse. Dr. Koussevitzky received a warm welcome when he appeared for the opening number and the farewell applause at the close of the programme was worthy of the splendid group of numbers that had been given.

It was the new and the old, the tried and true, tested over the years, in company with the experimental and perhaps it is not unfair to say—the probational. A programme beginning with Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont," followed immediately by the present-day "Enchanted Isle," by Gruenberg, and a rather familiar Strauss number, comes to a triumphant close with Beethoven again. Surely that is typically Koussevitzky, and the auditor feels that he is at home, that he is listening to the great Boston orchestra in its normal mood, directed by a man whose broad sympathies extend over the whole field of musical history.

The Egmont overture, not the most entrancing of Beethoven numbers regularly played by great orchestras, was given conventional treatment, leaving the hearer in a mood for something different when the essentially different Gruenberg number came. He was not disappointed, and those in the audience who are ready to welcome something new found inspiration in "The Enchanted Isle." It is not the kind of newness one finds in Honneger, for example, but it is fresh and has the element of surprise that makes one like it. And the players, too, seemed to like it. They gave to it all they had and seemed to revel in the doing of something out of the ordinary.

The Strauss number was "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," often played at these concerts and always enjoyed as novelties are. It was followed by the symphony. Beethoven's Fifth, and here was the orchestra at its glorious best, directed by a master who never fails to find the greatest there is in the marvelous Beethoven. To the hearer it seemed that all else on the programme was merely preparatory that orchestra had been trying things out so to speak, and now came the concert.

Manifestly a Beethoven symphony is a concert in itself and when played with the beauty the Boston players gave their performance on this occasion it is a thing of ravishing beauty. Listening to it one does not have a fear for the future of music; if he is impatient with jazz he forgets his impatience. The fact is that he forgets entirely all other music but that of Beethoven. This, at any rate, was the way it seemed on listening to Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the Fifth Symphony last night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

Boston Symphony

PROGRAM

Beethoven—
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont." Op.84

Gruenberg—
"The Enchanted Isle," Symphonic Poem

Strauss—
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," after the Old-fashioned, Roguish Manner,—in Rondo Form, Op. 28.

Beethoven—
Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67
I. Allegro con brio
II. Andante con moto
III. Allegro; Trio
IV. Allegro

It was pleasant last evening to see again the familiar faces of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its distinguished director, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, and hear once more the well-known strains of our old familiar friend, the C Minor Symphony, the sharp laughter of our old acquaintance, Till Eulenspiegel, and the new stories of our young acquaintance of the Enchanted Isle.

Perhaps it was the latter that attracted us most, for ever since the days of Homer —and the Enchanted Isle goes back to him—it has been the peculiar characteristic of audiences to welcome ever the song that is newest. Pindar tells us that it was the same in his day, with perhaps a note of satire in his voice; and here today we demand with the same insistence fresh songs to relieve the tedium of the old.

We have never heard the orchestra perform with more fire or more elan. It was a performance con brio throughout. There was a fluency and luminosity in the playing that at times suggested the high places up in the cold blue sky; and again a pitting of instrument against instrument in a struggle that suggested body against body and curse against curse, with all the clangor and uproar of the pit. Storm and strife, calm and serene sunshine, sweet deception, malignant plotting, mixed with the shrieking, demoniac laughter that breaks in sardonic scorn from the sky spread over a Paradise of Fools. Which was best and which worst is purely a matter of personal taste and preference.

The Standard Works

Musicians of whatever taste never weary of Beethoven. Each repetition brings them something never noticed before. So it was last night. There was a shifting of color in the reeds, an altered glow in the strings, an unwonted fulness in the brass, an unsuspected sting in a note hitherto believed guileless-one and all making him as subtle and elusive as the clouds that roll up from the horizon and change without rest before the wind.

He is the old Cloud-Compeller, mighty, insistent, but withal tolerant, as a god should be. He rouses us to aspire and he lays us in the dust; he jeers at our infirmity and he raises a paean that makes us strong. Where is there another such as he?

But for all that, there seemed to be lacking a certain tenderness that so often walks in Beethoven's music hand in hand with nobility of soul. There was force in abundance, mysticism, impetuosity (perhaps at times a little too much), but the tender grace of a day that is dead, that Beethoven loved so well to contemplate, only to dash it in the dust in one of his cynical outbursts, does not always make itself manifest in the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at least when it plays here. Perhaps the mood is akin to the sublime in literature and is not given to every orchestra to express.

The Fresh Gruenberg

And "The Enchanted Isle"—how new and how old! Modern self-confidence of treatment, and modern dearth of native composition material. Why bother about enchantment when the very idea is now discarded along with the witches and demons, and the devils that have long been cast out? Why meddle with Ulysses and Calypso on their magic isle, or Ulysses and Circe in their magic Schweinerei, and pretend to make from these something new?

The Greeks had a word which they used with no intention of compliment—to Phrygianize—which in music and poetry was synonymous with poor judgment and questionable taste. That is what so many modern composers and quasi-composers are doing today; they are Phrygianizing the little jewels and gems inherited from their ancestors, giving them a new costume-setting.

Their music is not the music that will either make us laugh or weep. They are pretty things that we take in our hands and examine and turn this way and that only to throw away. Like insects they live their little day and die.

The Way of the New Man

Of course we know that all this and worse was said of Beethoven, Schumann, Wagner and the rest; but those worthies at least seemed to advance the kingdom of music; they made their characters walk the fields of the Epic or the boards of Tragedy; now when a new character comes on, we wonder whether to look for him in Rabelais, Gulliver's Travels, or the Isle of the Penguins.

But Till Eulenspiegel is a different matter. Last night he seemed deeply rooted in the soil, a rare combination of Aristophanes in his most malignant moments and Browning in a peculiarly crabbed mood; and perhaps, like those two, his mood was a mere affectation, a parody of backwoods wit assumed for those who know what to laugh at, while it provided righteous indignation for those who had no clue or lacked the fundamental sense of humor so necessary for all who are to enter into the spirit of the piece.

Beyond a doubt the orchestra made it acrid and bitter enough, but it was deft enough in its drawings to blot out the sketches before we realized fully whether they were of Caliban or the Sirens; which we take to be skill of a very high order. M. C. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS

-:- MUSIC -:-

OPENING THE SEASON

Mr. Koussevitzky and his comrades of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened the musical season here in its main aspect last night with a programme that, except in one number, was very familiar. There were two Beethoven numbers, the "Egmont" overture and the famous Fifth Symphony; and there was Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." In playing these, Mr. Koussevitzky showed all his familiar technical brilliancy, but he still seems to have a hard time in understanding the Teuton mind. He interprets Beethoven with great reverence, as becomes a man of genius who tries to do full justice to a greater genius whom he does not understand completely. In the "Till Eulenspiegel" we found Mr. Koussevitzky, as we did a few years ago, trying to make the robust Teutonic fun and satire of the thing too subtly and civilizedly Gallic.

The novelty was Louis Gruenberg's "The Enchanted Isle." Mr. Koussevitzky played it beautifully and it is music that will always have an audience. It is, of all new things we have heard lately in music, that which expresses best the same sort of ideal that runs in literary expression from Maeterlinck to Joyce's "stream of consciousness." We hail it all the more gladly because Mr. Gruenberg used to tell us of his hopes of interpreting "the mystic wanderer" long before he had such acknowledgment as Mr. Koussevitzky has given him.

J.

158

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

Serge Koussevitzky
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Which Opens Its Providence Season Tuesday Night in Albee Theatre—from a silhouette by H. D. Wetherbee.

The Fifth Symphony for Our First

A Beethoven Backbone Gives Koussevitzky His Chance as the Boston Symphony Season Opens.—A New American Poem and Strauss's Pranks

It was pleasant last evening to see again the familiar faces of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its distinguished director, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, and hear once more the well-known strains of our old familiar friend, the C Minor Symphony, the sharp laughter of our old acquaintance, Till Eulenspiegel, and the new stories of our young acquaintance of the Enchanted Isle.

Perhaps it was the latter that attracted us most, for ever since the days of Homer—and the Enchanted Isle goes back to him—it has been the peculiar characteristic of audiences to welcome ever the song that is newest. Pindar tells us that it was the same in his day, with perhaps a note of satire in his voice; and here today we demand with the same insistence fresh songs to relieve the tedium of the old.

We have never heard the orchestra perform with more fire or more elan. It was a performance con brio throughout. There was a fluency and luminosity in the playing that at times suggested the high places up in the cold blue sky; and again a pitting of instrument against instrument in a struggle that suggested body against body and curse against curse, with all the clangor and uproar of the pit. Storm and strife, calm and serene sunshine, sweet deception, malignant plotting, mixed with the shrieking, demoniac laughter that breaks in sardonic scorn from the sky spread over a Paradise of Fools. Which was best and which worst is purely a matter of personal taste and preference.

The Standard Works

Musicians of whatever taste never weary of Beethoven. Each repetition brings them something never noticed before. So it was last night. There was a shifting of color in the reeds, an altered glow in the strings, an unwonted fulness in the brass, an unsuspected sting in a note hitherto believed guileless-one and all making him as subtle and elusive as the clouds that roll up from the horizon and change without rest before the wind.

He is the old Cloud-Compeller, mighty, insistent, but withal tolerant, as a god should be. He rouses us to aspire and he lays us in the dust; he jeers at our infirmity and he raises a paean that makes us strong. Where is there another such as he?

But for all that, there seemed to be lacking a certain tenderness that so often walks in Beethoven's music hand in hand with nobility of soul. There was force in abundance, mysticism, impetuosity (perhaps at times a little too much), but the tender grace of a day that is dead, that Beethoven loved so well to contemplate, only to dash it in the dust in one of his cynical outbursts, does not always make itself manifest in the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at least when it plays here. Perhaps the mood is akin to the sublime in literature and is not given to every orchestra to express.

The Fresh Gruenberg

And "The Enchanted Isle"—how new and how old! Modern self-confidence of treatment, and modern dearth of native composition material. Why bother about enchantment when the very idea is now discarded along with the witches and demons, and the devils that have long been cast out? Why meddle with Ulysses and Calypso on their magic isle, or Ulysses and Circe in their magic Schweinerei, and pretend to make from these something new?

The Greeks had a word which they used with no intention of compliment—to Phrygianize—which in music and poetry was synonymous with poor judgment and questionable taste. That is what so many modern composers and quasi-composers are doing today; they are Phrygianizing the little jewels and gems inherited from their ancestors, giving them a new costume-setting.

Their music is not the music that will either make us laugh or weep. They are pretty things that we take in our hands and examine and turn this way and that only to throw away. Like insects they live their little day and die.

The Way of the New Man

Of course we know that all this and worse was said of Beethoven, Schumann, Wagner and the rest; but those worthies at least seemed to advance the kingdom of music; they made their characters walk the fields of the Epic or the boards of Tragedy; now when a new character comes on, we wonder whether to look for him in Rabelais, Gulliver's Travels, or the Isle of the Penguins.

But Till Eulenspiegel is a different matter. Last night he seemed deeply rooted in the soil, a rare combination of Aristophanes in his most malignant moments and Browning in a peculiarly crabbed mood; and perhaps, like those two, his mood was a mere affectation, a parody of backwoods wit assumed for those who know what to laugh at, while it provided righteous indignation for those who had no clue or lacked the fundamental sense of humor so necessary for all who are to enter into the spirit of the piece.

Beyond a doubt the orchestra made it acrid and bitter enough, but it was deft enough in its drawings to blot out the sketches before we realized fully whether they were of Caliban or the Sirens; which we take to be skill of a very high order.

M. C. W.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Beethoven—
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op.84

Gruenberg—
"The Enchanted Isle," Symphonic Poem

Strauss—
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," after the Old-fashioned, Roguish Manner,—in Rondo Form, Op. 28.

Beethoven—
Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67
I. Allegro con brio
II. Andante con moto
III. Allegro; Trio
IV. Allegro

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

Boston Symphony Concerts Opened in Albee Theatre

Koussevitzky Plays Two Beethoven Numbers and One Novelty.

Once again the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens a course of concerts in Providence, and once again its splendid music is presented under the guidance of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The first of the season's concerts was played last evening in the Albee Theatre, with the usual audience, comprising music lovers from all parts of Rhode Island and Massachusetts, completely filing the large playhouse. Dr. Koussevitzky received a warm welcome when he appeared for the opening number and the farewell applause at the close of the programme was worthy of the splendid group of numbers that had been given.

It was the new and the old, the tried and true, tested over the years, in company with the experimental and perhaps it is not unfair to say—the probational. A programme beginning with Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont," followed immediately by the present-day "Enchanted Isle," by Gruenberg, and a rather familiar Strauss number, comes to a triumphant close with Beethoven again. Surely that is typically Koussevitzky, and the auditor feels that he is at home, that he is listening to the great Boston orchestra in its normal mood, directed by a man whose broad sympathies extend over the whole field of musical history.

The Egmont overture, not the most entrancing of Beethoven numbers regularly played by great orchestras, was given conventional treatment, leaving the hearer in a mood for something different when the essentially different Gruenberg number came. He was not disappointed, and those in the audience who are ready to welcome something new found inspiration in "The Enchanted Isle." It is not the kind of newness one finds in Honneger, for example, but it is fresh and has the element of surprise that makes one like it. And the players, too, seemed to like it. They gave to it all they had and seemed to revel in the doing of something out of the ordinary.

The Strauss number was "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," often played at these concerts and always enjoyed as novelties are. It was followed by the symphony, Beethoven's Fifth, and here was the orchestra at its glorious best, directed by a master who never fails to find the greatest there is in the marvelous Beethoven. To the hearer it seemed that all else on the programme was merely preparatory that orchestra had been trying things out so to speak, and now came the concert.

Manifestly a Beethoven symphony is a concert in itself and when played with the beauty the Boston players gave their performance on this occasion it is a thing of ravishing beauty. Listening to it one does not have a fear for the future of music; if he is impatient with jazz he forgets his impatience. The fact is that he forgets entirely all other music but that of Beethoven. This, at any rate, was the way it seemed on listening to Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the Fifth Symphony last night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

Boston Symphony

PROGRAM

Beethoven—
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op.84

Gruenberg—
"The Enchanted Isle," Symphonic Poem

Strauss—
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," after the Old-fashioned, Roguish Manner,—in Rondo Form, Op. 28.

Beethoven—
Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67
I. Allegro con brio
II. Andante con moto
III. Allegro; Trio
IV. Allegro

It was pleasant last evening to see again the familiar faces of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its distinguished director, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, and hear once more the well-known strains of our old familiar friend, the C Minor Symphony, the sharp laughter of our old acquaintance, Till Eulenspiegel, and the new stories of our young acquaintance of the Enchanted Isle.

Perhaps it was the latter that attracted us most, for ever since the days of Homer—and the Enchanted Isle goes back to him—it has been the peculiar characteristic of audiences to welcome ever the song that is newest. Pindar tells us that it was the same in his day, with perhaps a note of satire in his voice; and here today we demand with the same insistence fresh songs to relieve the tedium of the old.

We have never heard the orchestra perform with more fire or more elan. It was a performance con brio throughout. There was a fluency and luminosity in the playing that at times suggested the high places up in the cold blue sky; and again a pitting of instrument against instrument in a struggle that suggested body against body and curse against curse, with all the clangor and uproar of the pit. Storm and strife, calm and serene sunshine, sweet deception, maligning, mixed with the shrieking, demoniac laughter that breaks in sardonic scorn from the sky spread over a Paradise of Fools. Which was best and which worst is purely a matter of personal preference.

Standard Works

Musicians of whatever taste never weary of Beethoven. Each repetition brings them something never noticed before. So it was last night. There was a shifting of color in the reeds, an altered glow in the strings, an unwonted fulness in the brass, an unsuspected sting in a note hitherto believed guileless-one and all making him as subtle and elusive as the clouds that roll up from the horizon and change without rest before the wind.

He is the old Cloud-Compeller, mighty, insistent, but withal tolerant, as a god should be. He rouses us to aspire and he lays us in the dust; he jeers at our infirmity and he raises a paean that makes us strong. Where is there another such as he?

But for all that, there seemed to be lacking a certain tenderness that so often walks in Beethoven's music hand in hand with nobility of soul. There was force in abundance, mysticism, impetuosity (perhaps at times a little too much), but the tender grace of a day that is dead, that Beethoven loved so well to contemplate, only to dash it in the dust in one of his cynical outbursts, does not always make itself manifest in the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at least when it plays here. Perhaps the mood is akin to the sublime in literature and is not given to every orchestra to express.

The Fresh Gruenberg

And "The Enchanted Isle"—how new and how old! Modern self-confidence of treatment, and modern dearth of native composition material. Why bother about enchantment when the very idea is now discarded along with the witches and demons, and the devils that have long been cast out? Why meddle with Ulysses and Calypso on their magic isle, or Ulysses and Circe in their magic Schweinerei, and pretend to make from these something new?

The Greeks had a word which they used with no intention of compliment—to Phrygianize—which in music and poetry was synonymous with poor judgment and questionable taste. That is what so many modern composers and quasi-composers are doing today; they are Phrygianizing the little jewels and gems inherited from their ancestors, giving them a new costume-setting.

Their music is not the music that will either make us laugh or weep. They are pretty things that we take in our hands and examine and turn this way and that only to throw away. Like insects they live their little day and die.

The Way of the New Man

Of course we know that all this and worse was said of Beethoven, Schumann, Wagner and the rest; but those worthies at least seemed to advance the kingdom of music; they made their characters walk the fields of the Epic or the boards of Tragedy; now when a new character comes on, we wonder whether to look for him in Rabelais, Gulliver's Travels, or the Isle of the Penguins.

But Till Eulenspiegel is a different matter. Last night he seemed deeply rooted in the soil, a rare combination of Aristophanes in his most malignant moments and Browning in a peculiarly crabbed mood; and perhaps, like those two, his mood was a mere affectation, a parody of backwoods wit assumed for those who know what to laugh at, while it provided righteous indignation for those who had no clue or lacked the fundamental sense of humor so necessary for all who are to enter into the spirit of the piece.

Beyond a doubt the orchestra made it acrid and bitter enough, but it was deft enough in its drawings to blot out the sketches before we realized fully whether they were of Caliban or the Sirens; which we take to be skill of a very high order.

M. C. W.

TM
ENT
Ph OP
OT
LA
SA
C-E
-Unbreaka reach of EXAMIN
CTIONS
P-A-MIN
dgework—F
FESS ACTI
our Teeth an

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS

-:- MUSIC -:-

OPENING THE SEASON

Mr. Koussevitzky and his comrades of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened the musical season here in its main aspect last night with a programme that, except in one number, was very familiar. There were two Beethoven numbers, the "Egmont" overture and the famous Fifth Symphony; and there was Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." In playing these, Mr. Koussevitzky showed all his familiar technical brilliancy, but he still seems to have a hard time in understanding the Teuton mind. He interprets Beethoven with great reverence, as becomes a man of genius who tries to do full justice to a greater genius whom he does not understand completely. In the "Till Eulenspiegel" we found Mr. Koussevitzky, as we did a few years ago, trying to make the robust Teutonic fun and satire of the thing too subtly and civilizedly Gallic.

The novelty was Louis Gruenberg's "The Enchanted Isle." Mr. Koussevitzky played it beautifully and it is music that will always have an audience. It is, of all new things we have heard lately in music, that which expresses best the same sort of ideal that runs in literary expression from Maeterlinck to Joyce's "stream of consciousness." We hail it all the more gladly because Mr. Gruenberg used to tell us of his hopes of interpreting "the mystic wanderer" long before he had such acknowledgment as Mr. Koussevitzky has given him.

J.

REDUCTION RATIO 14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

"Primitive Love Passion Described More Frankly in Great Music Than in Any Banned Literature"—Arthur Fiedler

BY GEORGE BRINTON BEAL

New Leader of Pops, and First Bostonian to Win Honor, Claims That if Music Were Censored Like Plays and "Movies" There Would Be Wild Times at Symphony Hall

"ARTISTS aren't any different than other people, except they have one less skin." Arthur Fiedler, recently chosen to lead the Pops this spring, the first Boston man to ever have the job, was talking, as he grabbed a hasty lunch between engagements.

"That is what makes them more sensitive," he continued, looking regretfully at his cleanly emptied plate. "You see, there is a lot of bunk in most of the stuff you read and hear about artists, whether they are musicians, actors, painters or writers. People seem to take a special delight in making them out something they are not, but why, I quite fail to understand.

"Take all this talk about my being such a romantic cuss, it really isn't so. I am appreciative of romance, being a musician and, I hope, an artist. I have emotions, and I put them to work for me. It seems to me that what most people take for romance is nothing but sentimentality, and I loath that."

His soft brown eyes were flashing fire, his words came lurching out of his mouth at headlong speed, one crowding the other in their eagerness to be heard. It was difficult to realize that he was a Bostonian, born and bred.

"I have travelled pretty nearly all over the world, always seeking knowledge, musical knowledge, knowledge of people and places, hungry to capture every last mite of color and atmosphere of every place I visited. My reason is not the love of adventure which has been so largely attributed to me. Adventures most of my trips proved to be, but that was because of the necessity of going about with very little financial backing. My real reason was to be able to interpret my music better by knowing first hand its source.

"Many a colorful dive I have wandered into in out of the way spots on the earth's surface, dives where a man's life wasn't worth a penny. There I have heard native orchestras play, there I have listened to music played by people who love it, live for it, and for practically nothing else. There I have heard gypsy music . . . unforgettable music played by artists, great artists whose fame will never travel beyond the narrow limits of their own native villages.

"The world doesn't yet quite understand its artists. Perhaps it is part of the artists' fate to be forever misunderstood. I do not know. Music, especially, is so troubled by false ideas of it and of the people who spend their lives writing and playing it for the enjoyment of the public.

Those Silly People

"Silly people who never really understand music at all are responsible for much that is false concerning the public opinion of music and musicians. They go to concerts to 'get a kick out of them,' these silly ones. They roll their eyes and tell each other, and all of the world that will listen, how deeply they were moved by some piece of music or other. It isn't so. Music didn't move them. Their own emotions did it, not the music at all. The ideas they brought in with them and not the ideas that the music awakened in them, did it. Why blame the music?

"And there is something else. All this bunk about people writing poems and music and stories with their hearts and minds filled to overflowing with their one great love. It isn't done that way at all. No great genius ever started out to do anything of the kind.

To Create Beauty

"An artist starts out to create a beautiful thing, it may be a piece of music, a poem, a novel, anything. It isn't written to anyone in particular any more than it is inspired by anyone in particular. Art is not personal and never can be, and remain art. Art is the striving of the human soul for expression. Yet the public insists on believing that it is personal, and always seeks to find the person to whom or for whom the work was done.

"Of course, being a musician, I am an emotional sort of person. Music, you see, is the only art that can express emotion in the raw, so to speak. No other art can quite do that. It is the distinctive feature of music that it can.

Certain phrases from Richard Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben" fill the listener's mind with recollections of real or pictured military scenes, like "General Macard," by the great artist, Eugene Chaperone.

"Almost anything can be said—and is said—in music." These notes are from Wagner's "The Flying Dutchman." Painting is "Aegir," by the famous artist, C. Ehrenberg.

"Tschaikowsky's 'Romeo and Juliet' overture is passion unveiled. Here is frank emotional outpouring of human feelings, primitive, abysmal." Romeo and Juliet picture by Palmaroli.

Censoring Music!

"If music was censored, as stage plays and motion pictures are censored, for its meaning, there would be wild times at Symphony Hall. Almost anything can be said, and is, in music. Raw emotions are the tools of the composer, just as raw colors those of the artist. If such a censorship existed, Wagner would be banned in Boston. In all art he has no equal in the length to which he has gone in expressing human passion in the raw. Take, for instance, his 'Prelude,' 'Love Death' from 'Tristan and Isolde.' It beggars description, what he has said by means of his music.

"Another example is to be found in Tschaikowsky's 'Romeo and Juliet' overture. Here is passion unveiled, no mincing matters, no subterfuge, frank emotional outpouring of human feelings, primitive, abysmal. To come down to a modern composer, take Ravel's 'Bolero.' It outranks jazz for its barbaric splendor.

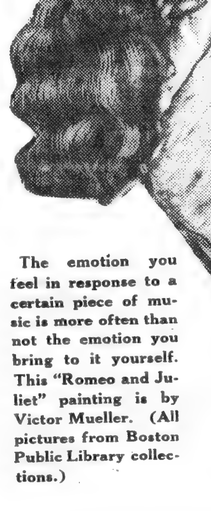
"If that particular selection were continued very much longer than it is written, it would drive an audience quite mad. There is no more emotionally powerful music written, so far as I can recall. Incidentally, I shall play it during this summer's Pops, in all probability.

Meaning of Thrills

"But all this has nothing or very little to do with what people ordinarily mean when they tell of being thrilled by music. In the music I have mentioned it was the purpose of the writer to express a certain emotion in music; it was, in all probability, not his intention to arouse that or any other specific emotion, except, perhaps, admiration and appreciation of a job well done, in the mind of the hearer.

"The emotions you feel in response to a certain piece of music is more often than not the emotion you bring to it yourself. Women are more sensitive to this sort of thing than men, in my opinion. A man is more likely to admire the technique of the player or the mechanical beauty in design of the music itself. He does not, as a rule, take his music any more personally than he does, in many instances, his affairs of the heart. A woman is personal, she is personal in her reaction to music just as she is to her reaction to other things in life, men included. Music affords her a great opportunity to spend her emotional energies. She blames the music when, as a matter of strict truth, she is herself to blame. That which she hears she has a tendency to make the basis of a creation of her own individual imagination.

"And there is another important factor that enters into what many people confuse with the emotional effects of music. That is memory. People hear a piece of music; it brings back to them the memory of some other time when they heard it. It brings back, pleasantly indeed, something of the emotions which they were enjoying on that other earlier occasion. They feel the same thrill, say, that they first felt when in some far away spot of beauty they first felt the kisses of some one they deeply loved, because the musical background of that time is now being repeated.



The emotion you feel in response to a certain piece of music is more often than not the emotion you bring to it yourself. This "Romeo and Juliet" painting is by Victor Mueller. (All pictures from Boston Public Library collections.)

"There are many such moments in the lives of many people, moments with which music are more intimately associated than they themselves realize. Hearing again the same music, even under widely differing circumstances, brings the whole picture back into focus again. This, quite clearly, is not emotional response to anything in the music, but memory revived and strengthened by the music, an entirely different thing, and one for which the composer and his intentions have nothing whatever to do with.

The Fifty Million

"Perhaps, curiously enough a German composer, Wagner, as I have mentioned before, is the greatest emotional writer that music has known. I cannot think of a single French composer who is emotional; in a true sense of the term. French composers prefer to tickle the senses, rather than to feed them.

"The French composers are ethereal, rather than personal. They love to take an idea and play with it, decorating and embellishing it; doing everything, in fact, except bring it firmly down to earth and reality.

"Since the days of the great romanticists, Beethoven, Shubert, Shumann and the rest of them, music has been changing. It is always changing, as a matter of fact, as all living things must. This present age is an age of machines, of mechanical creations. The nearest that it can get in the direction of romance is sentimentality. The music of the day reflects this as all arts must ever reflect the life of their own era. Of our present day American writers George Gershwin is, perhaps, the most promising of all. He has his moments of genuine feeling, of greatness. His 'An American In Paris,' is a fair example of his work. I shall put it on the Pops programme sometime during the season. It is worth playing and worth listening to.

"Since Wagner, Jazz is the most outspoken music, emotionally, that the world has known. It is licentious, primitive. It lacks entirely the reticence that conservative minds declare an essential of real art. Its vitality is amazing, when it is good jazz, for there are both good and bad jazz compositions; it is well to warn those who would condemn its entire output as an outrageous travesty on music and not music at all.

"But if the crude and primitive message of some jazz compositions invites censorship by its frankness, consider the Bacchanale, 'Parisian' from Tannhauser! Lewd is the only word that describes it, and that does but mild justice to it. Not that it effects people in that way, for it is one of the interesting factors that go to make up the sum total of people's reaction to music; that which the composer actually meant is seldom, in my opinion, what the audience feels in response to it.

"I have a great respect for audiences. My 15 years as a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has done that for me, at least. And my Esplanade concerts last summer, which, by the way, I hope to repeat this summer, following my season with the Pops, added to that respect and to my knowledge concerning mass appreciation of music.

You begin to realize that Arthur Fiedler has not come to his present position by mere chance, as he continues to lay before you his ideas and dreams of future achievement. Already you are beginning to figure out just how many nights a week you can manage to spend at the Pops. He has a convincing way of talking, this slender, dark complexioned person, who looks much too young to know so much. Loudly as he denies that he is not romantic, his own description of what music means to him, and of what he intends to do as conductor of the Pops, belies his denial. Life to him is one great, romantic adventure. He has the insatiate curiosity of the true artist and, more than most others, the ability to express his ideas not only through the medium of his art but in words as well.

Unlike Casella

He is a curious contrast to the man he supplants as director of the Pops, Casella. Like a prince charming out of a story book was Casella.

What a different picture the new conductor presents! He is aggressively American. His step is hurried, his speech swift, staccato. When he walks, his slender body is thrust forward from the hips. He always seems to be going somewhere in a hurry, and usually is. His hand-clasp is warm and friendly. His eyes look straight into yours.

And he has ideas. That is, perhaps, the most outstanding feature of his make-up. He has ideas and he is not afraid to speak right out in meeting and let everyone in on the secret that he has them. Take the matter of applause, for instance. Not long ago it came in for quite a bit of discussion because the great Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Philharmonic orchestra took issue with his audiences in Philadelphia in the matter of when and how, if ever, applause should be introduced into a concert hall. Stokowski was in favor of banning it altogether. Not so Fiedler.

"You do not wait until a baseball game is all done and the score announced," says Fiedler, "before you start cheering. Nor do you wait until a race is over and the winner announced. Whenever anything exciting happens, when you feel the need of expressing your awakened emotions, that is when you cheer and applause. So it should be in music, although, of course, I realize it would be rather hard on the musicians to be so interrupted. But, as for myself, I would never feel anything but satisfaction in causing an unexpected outburst of applause, even if it did bring awkward results.

Another hasty glance at his wrist watch, there had been many such during the course of the conversation, a hurried but cordial hand-shake, and he was hurrying up the street like a man possessed by some great idea and spurred on to haste by the fear that it might somehow elude him if he tarried too long upon the way.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

160

Herald Feb 4

ARTHUR FIEDLER WILL CONDUCT POP CONCERT

Will Be First Bostonian to Appear In That Role

Arthur Fiedler, pianist and viola player of the Boston symphony orchestra, who organized, instituted and conducted the Esplanade concerts on the Charles river embankment last August, will be conductor of the Pop concerts next spring, according to announcement from Symphony hall.

Mr. Fiedler was born in Boston in 1894 and will be the first Bostonian to conduct the Pop concerts. He was graduated from the Boston Latin school, after which he studied in the Royal Academy of Music, Berlin. He joined the Boston symphony orchestra in 1915.

FIEDLER TO CONDUCT THE POP CONCERTS

Arthur Fiedler is to be the conductor of the Pop concerts next Spring, according to an announcement from Symphony Hall.

Arthur Fiedler, well known as the conductor of chamber concerts, of the Esplanade concerts last Summer, of the Cecilia Society Chorus, as pianist and viola player of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the first Bostonian conductor of the Pops. The coming Pops season will be the 45th. It will open on Wednesday, May 7, and will last for nine weeks. Special nights are now being engaged by schools, colleges, clubs and other organizations.

Globe Feb 4

ARTHUR FIEDLER

The son of Emmanuel Fiedler, for 25 years a violinist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra and one of the original members of the Kneisel Quartet, Arthur Fiedler comes of a long musical line, his grandparents (both Austrians) having been musicians. Born in Boston in 1894, Arthur Fiedler went to the Royal Academy of Music in Berlin to study, after graduating from the Boston Latin School. He studied conducting, piano and violin, but the coming of the war prevented him from graduating. Fiedler joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1915.

As conductor of the "Sinfonietta" he has been a pioneer of modern music in smaller forms. He has on numerous occasions conducted special nights at the Pops. It was he who organized and instituted as well as conducted the Esplanade concerts on the Charles River Embankment last August.

Monitor, Feb. 4

of Boston, musically educated in Germany, a viola and celesta player in the orchestra, Mr. Fiedler became known to a large public last summer, when he organized and conducted a series of concerts on the Charles River Basin Esplanade. He is also conductor of the Boston Sinfonietta, which he organized, and of the Cecilis Society.

Arthur Fiedler New Pop Concerts Leader

Arthur Fiedler is to be the next Pops conductor. He is a native of Boston and has been a member of the Symphony Orchestra since 1915. He has won fame and popularity already as leader of the Sinfonietta and of the Esplanade concerts which he started last year.

Herald Feb 4

EILEEN MERCEDES FROM THE KIT KAT CLUB, London
Now With GEO. MacKINNON And His All-Girl Revue
At The SILVER SLIPPER 111 ARLINGTON ST
Also Alyce Siemens and the Rutina Anderson Steppers (Cutest Legwavers in Town)
Dinner Show at 7:45 Without Cover Charge
Theatrical Guest Night Wednesday

Feb 6

STON POST, THUR

TO LEAD POPS

Arthur Fiedler, well known musician who gained his greatest popular fame, perhaps, as conductor of the Esplanade concerts last summer, will be conductor of the Pops concerts next spring, it was announced last night. The Pops will open this year on Wednesday, May 7.

Lightening Boston's Pops

APPOINTMENT of Arthur Fiedler as conductor of Boston's Symphony Hall Pop concerts next spring promises well for the continued success of that characteristic institution. Every spring, for forty-five years, at the close of the regular Boston Symphony Orchestra season, it has been the custom to clear away the seats from the floor, to install tables and to embark upon a two-months season of popular concerts, with refreshments available. These concerts have always been popular. With prohibition they became more popular and more successful. They are a pleasant and a typical feature of Boston life.

Like most human institutions, the Pops require occasional overhauling and modification to adapt them to the changing times. Unfortunately, during the last few years, progress has been made a bit too rapidly. Pops' programs had come to be hardly "lighter" than those of the regular symphony season. Result, a falling off in attendance.

Clearly, a more moderate policy was in order. Good standards of music must be maintained, of course; but it was not desirable to frighten off musical explorers by offering them programs of too forbidding mien. It was possible to soften these rigors now and then with more caressing zephyrs.

Who could best accomplish this result, restore the Pops to popularity and build up new supporters? Since last summer it has been apparent to well-informed observers that Mr. Fiedler was the man. For five weeks in July and August he conducted popular symphony concerts on the Charles River Basin Esplanade. During that time he built programs that struck a happy medium between the severely classic and the popular, thereby attracting constantly increasing audiences. Here, obviously, was the man to restore the Symphony Hall Pops.

...een

Transcript Feb 4

Reviving The Pops

Timely Task for Which Arthur Fiedler Seems the Fittest Man

NO easy task faces Arthur Fiedler, announced this morning as conductor of the Pop Concerts through next spring and summer. The balance of the programs has admittedly gone awry. A new conductor must restore the happy proportion between light and serious numbers, between classic, modern and popular items, to which relation "The Pops" have long owed their vogue. There are many publics to please; some indeed to be won back after a year or two of abstinence; one or another, perhaps, to be restrained, since it would have the concerts too routined and muted.

Fortunately, Mr. Fiedler knows them all. Like them, he is native to this town—the first conductor of The Pops to be such. Fortunately also, he is a musician of flexible mind and wide-ranging taste, asking only of a given piece that it be of interest and merit in the kind, whether Beethoven or George Gershwin is the signature. He has also the knack of pleasing an audience without yielding too often or too much to its chance whims. He spurs his men and they work for him. It is an open secret that of late he has revitalized the chorus of The Cecilia. By the same token it is his turn to revitalize The Pops, of late gone dull. Three months more and most of us may be applauding not only "Bolero" but also "Strike Up the Band."

Arthur Fiedler New Pop Concerts Leader

Herald Feb 4

Arthur Fiedler is to be the next Pops conductor. He is a native of Boston and has been a member of the Symphony Orchestra since 1915. He has won fame and popularity already as leader of the Sinfonietta and of the Esplanade concerts which he started last year.

EILEEN MERCEDES FROM THE KIT KAT CLUB, London
Now With GEO. MacKINNON And His All-Girl Revue
At The SILVER SLIPPER 111 ARLINGTON ST
Also Alyce Siemens and the Rutina Anderson Steppers (Cutest Legwavers in Town)
Dinner Show at 7:45 Without Cover Charge
Theatrical Guest Night Wednesday

Fiedler to Be New Pops Conductor

American Feb 4

Arthur Fieldler is to be conductor of the Pop Concerts next spring, according to an announcement from Symphony hall. Mr. Fiedler, well known as the conductor of chamber concerts, of the Esplanade concerts last summer, of the Cecilia Society chorus, as pianist and viola player of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the first Bostonian to conduct the Pops. The coming Pops season will be the 45th. It will open on Wednesday, May 7, for nine weeks.

Amusements

Fiedler to Be New Pops Conductor

American Feb 4

Arthur Fieldler is to be conductor of the Pop Concerts next spring, according to an announcement from Symphony hall. Mr. Fiedler, well known as the conductor of chamber concerts, of the Esplanade concerts last summer, of the Cecilia Society chorus, as pianist and viola player of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the first Bostonian to conduct the Pops. The coming Pops season will be the 45th. It will open on Wednesday, May 7, for nine weeks.

Amusements

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE HERALD

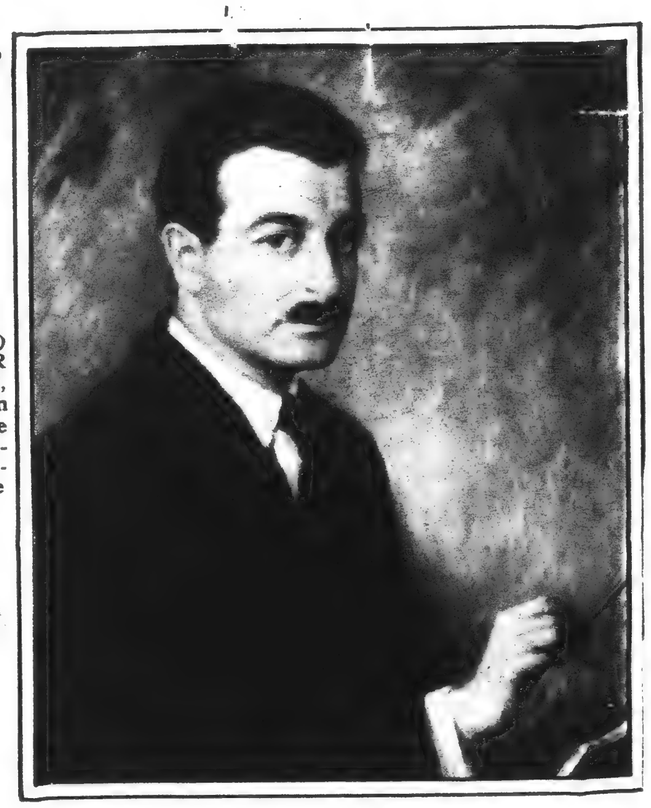
Feb 4

Valuation.

FIEDLER TO CONDUCT BOSTON SYMPHONY POPS.

BOSTON, Mass., Feb. 3 (AP).—Arthur Fiedler, widely known Boston Symphony Orchestra musician, will be the conductor of the pop concerts at Symphony hall next spring. Symphony hall officials announced today. He will be the first Bostonian conductor of the pops.

Truck Smashes Hearse.



(At right.) ARTHUR FIEDLER, well known and versatile Boston musician, as portrayed by Mme Piutti-Barth.

160

Herald Feb 4

ARTHUR FIEDLER WILL CONDUCT POP CONCERT

Will Be First Bostonian to Appear In That Role

Arthur Fiedler, pianist and viola player of the Boston symphony orchestra, who organized, instituted and conducted the Esplanade concerts on the Charles river embankment last August, will be conductor of the Pop concerts next spring, according to announcement from Symphony hall.

Mr. Fiedler was born in Boston in 1894 and will be the first Bostonian to conduct the Pop concerts. He was graduated from the Boston Latin school, after which he studied in the Royal Academy of Music, Berlin. He joined the Boston symphony orchestra in 1915.

FIEDLER TO CONDUCT THE POP CONCERTS

Arthur Fiedler is to be the conductor of the Pop concerts next Spring, according to an announcement from Symphony Hall.

Arthur Fiedler, well known as the conductor of chamber concerts, of the Esplanade concerts last Summer, of the Cecilia Society Chorus, as pianist

Globe Feb 4

ARTHUR FIEDLER

and viola player of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the first Bostonian conductor of the Pops. The coming Pops season will be the 45th. It will open on Wednesday, May 7, and will last for nine weeks. Special nights are now being engaged by schools, colleges, clubs and other organizations.

The son of Emmanuel Fiedler, for 25 years a violinist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra and one of the original members of the Kneisel Quartet, Arthur Fiedler comes of a long musical line, his grandparents (both Austrians) having been musicians. Born in Boston in 1894, Arthur Fiedler went to the Royal Academy of Music in Berlin to study, after graduating from the Boston Latin School. He studied conducting, piano and violin, but the coming of the war prevented him from graduating. Fiedler joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1915.

As conductor of the "Sinfonietta" he has been a pioneer of modern music in smaller forms. He has on numerous occasions conducted special nights at the Pops. It was he who organized and instituted as well as conducted the Esplanade concerts on the Charles River Embankment last August.

Monitor, Feb. 4

of Boston, musically educated in Germany, a viola and celesta player in the orchestra, Mr. Fiedler became known to a large public last summer, when he organized and conducted a series of concerts on the Charles River Basin Esplanade. He is also conductor of the Boston Sinfonietta, which he organized, and of the Cecilis Society.

Arthur Fiedler New Pop Concerts Leader

Arthur Fiedler is to be the next Pops conductor. He is a native of Boston and has been a member of the Symphony Orchestra since 1915. He has won fame and popularity already as leader of the Sinfonietta and of the Esplanade concerts which he started last year.

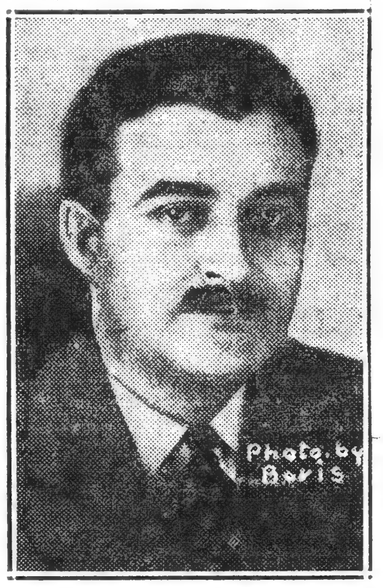
Herald Feb 4

EILEEN MERCEDES FROM THE KIT KAT CLUB, London
Now With GEO. MacKINNON And His All-Girl Revue
At The SILVER SLIPPER 111 ARLINGTON ST
Also Alyce Siemens and the Rutina Anderson Steppers (Cutest Legwavers in Town)
Dinner Show at 7:45 Without Cover Charge
Theatrical Guest Night Wednesday

Feb 6

STON POST, THUR

TO LEAD POPS



Arthur Fiedler, well known musician who gained his greatest popular fame, perhaps, as conductor of the Esplanade concerts last summer, will be conductor of the Pops concerts next spring, it was announced last night. The Pops will open this year on Wednesday, May 7.

Lightening Boston's Pops

Monitor Feb 6 1930

APPOINTMENT of Arthur Fiedler as conductor of Boston's Symphony Hall Pop concerts next spring promises well for the continued success of that characteristic institution. Every spring, for forty-five years, at the close of the regular Boston Symphony Orchestra season, it has been the custom to clear away the seats from the floor, to install tables and to embark upon a two-months season of popular concerts, with refreshments available. These concerts have always been popular. With prohibition they became more popular and more successful. They are a pleasant and a typical feature of Boston life.

Like most human institutions, the Pops require occasional overhauling and modification to adapt them to the changing times. Unfortunately, during the last few years, progress has been made a bit too rapidly. Pops' programs had come to be hardly "lighter" than those of the regular symphony season. Result, a falling off in attendance.

Clearly, a more moderate policy was in order. Good standards of music must be maintained, of course; but it was not desirable to frighten off musical explorers by offering them programs of too forbidding mien. It was possible to soften these rigors now and then with more caressing zephyrs.

Who could best accomplish this result, restore the Pops to popularity and build up new supporters? Since last summer it has been apparent to well-informed observers that Mr. Fiedler was the man. For five weeks in July and August he conducted popular symphony concerts on the Charles River Basin Esplanade. During that time he built programs that struck a happy medium between the severely classic and the popular, thereby attracting constantly increasing audiences. Here, obviously, was the man to restore the Symphony Hall Pops.

reen

Transcript Feb 4

Reviving The Pops

Timely Task for Which Arthur Fiedler Seems the Fittest Man

NO easy task faces Arthur Fiedler, announced this morning as conductor of the Pop Concerts through next spring and summer. The balance of the programs has admittedly gone awry. A new conductor must restore the happy proportion between light and serious numbers, between classic, modern and popular items, to which relation "The Pops" have long owed their vogue. There are many publics to please; some indeed to be won back after a year or two of abstinence; one or another, perhaps, to be restrained, since it would have the concerts too routined and muted.

Fortunately, Mr. Fiedler knows them all. Like them, he is native to this town—the first conductor of The Pops to be such. Fortunately also, he is a musician of flexible mind and wide-ranging taste, asking only of a given piece that it be of interest and merit in the kind, whether Beethoven or George Gershwin is the signature. H. has also the knack of pleasing an audience without yielding too often or too much to its chance whims. He spurs his men and they work for him. It is an open secret that of late he has revitalized the chorus of The Cecilia. By the same token it is his turn to revitalize The Pops, of late gone dull. Three months more and most of us may be applauding not only "Bolero" but also "Strike Up the Band."

Arthur Fiedler New Pop Concerts Leader

Herald Feb 4

Arthur Fiedler is to be the next Pops conductor. He is a native of Boston and has been a member of the Symphony Orchestra since 1915. He has won fame and popularity already as leader of the Sinfonietta and of the Esplanade concerts which he started last year.

EILEEN MERCEDES FROM THE KIT KAT CLUB, London
Now With GEO. MacKINNON And His All-Girl Revue
At The SILVER SLIPPER 111 ARLINGTON ST
Also Alyce Siemens and the Rutina Anderson Steppers (Cutest Legwavers in Town)
Dinner Show at 7:45 Without Cover Charge
Theatrical Guest Night Wednesday

Fiedler to Be New Pops Conductor

Arthur Fieldler is to be conductor of the Pop Concerts next spring, according to an announcement from Symphony hall. Mr. Fiedler, well known as the conductor of chamber concerts, of the Esplanade concerts last summer, of the Cecilia Society chorus, as pianist and viola player of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the first Bostonian to conduct the Pops. The coming Pops season will be the 45th. It will open on Wednesday, May 7, for nine weeks.

Amusements

American Feb 4

Fiedler to Be New Pops Conductor

Arthur Fieldler is to be conductor of the Pop Concerts next spring, according to an announcement from Symphony hall. Mr. Fiedler, well known as the conductor of chamber concerts, of the Esplanade concerts last summer, of the Cecilia Society chorus, as pianist and viola player of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the first Bostonian to conduct the Pops. The coming Pops season will be the 45th. It will open on Wednesday, May 7, for nine weeks.

Amusements

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE HERALD
Rutland, Vt.
FEB 4 1930

...ruation.

FIEDLER TO CONDUCT BOSTON SYMPHONY POPS.

BOSTON, Mass., Feb. 3 (AP).—Arthur Fiedler, widely known Boston Symphony Orchestra musician, will be the conductor of the pop concerts at Symphony hall next spring, Symphony hall officials announced today. He will be the first Bostonian conductor of the pops.

Truck Smashes Hearse.

(At right.) ARTHUR FIEDLER, well known and versatile Boston musician, as portrayed by Mme Piutti-Barth.

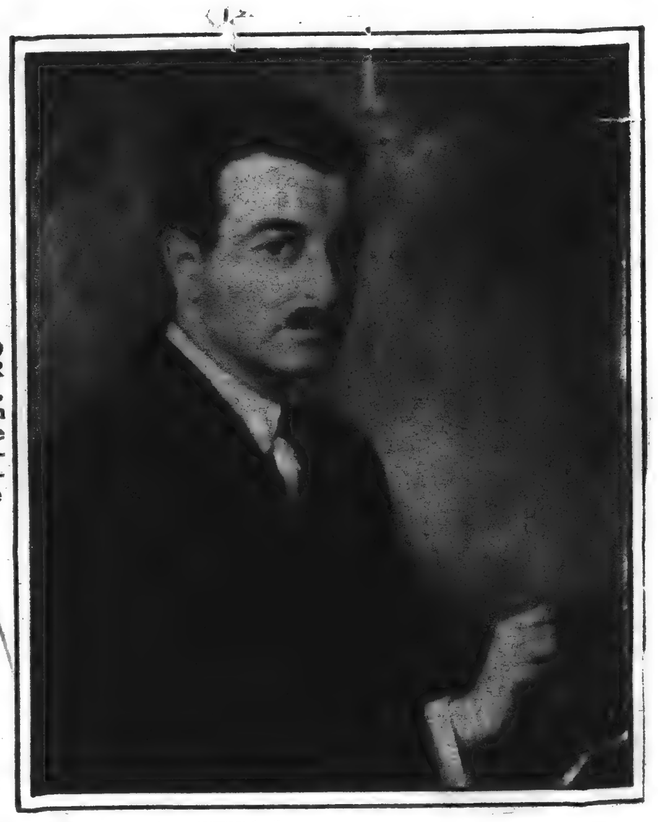
Herald Feb 9



REDUCTION RATIO 14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

2.0

2.2

2.5

2.8

3.2

3.6

4.0

4.5

5.0

5.6

6.3

7.1

8.0

9.0

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

N EARLIER "AMERICA" JUST DISCOVERED

n---Composer Wrote His Notes on Leather With Chalk---Paul Revere Decorated His Psalm Books represent Billings.

irst stanza of a patri-ful anthem soars,

fathers' God and ours:
we chose our seat:
tion's iron claws
ourist our calm retreat.
rediscovery drew the re-
a line of research that me highly interesting

stated that many of were sung and played
England troops were l Reporter, printed in s: "Many New England soldiers encamped in the South during the Revolution had many of his (Billings') popular tunes by heart, and frequently amused themselves by singing them in camp, to the delight of all who heard.

"A gentleman now living in Philadelphia, distinguished for his great literary attainments, as well as for his musical tastes, often speaks of the great pleasure he enjoyed from this source during that period; and that the name of Billings has been very dear to him, and associated with the happiest recollections, even to the present time."

A Song of His at Trenton

Everyone remembers the picturesque circumstances of Washington's capture of Trenton. It was Christmas night . . . Hessians, well-clothed, well-sheltered from wind and hard-driven snow, well fed, making merry with more food, with wine, with singing . . . Then all confusion, murderous rifle-fire, panic and rout, in the face of a suddenly-appearing army of tattered, underfed, storm-benumbed patriots.

There were New Englanders among the victors. Glover's Marblehead fishermen had ferried Washington and his contingent across on the surprise attack. Gen Greene of Rhode Island was there, with New Englanders in his command. In jubilation, and in thanksgiving, would they not have sung Billings' tune of Boston for which he specified Watt's Christmas poem as suitable words?

Shepherds, rejoice, lift up your eyes!

Two years after the Declaration of Independence, Billings published his second book, with words fited to several of his earlier tunes which had first been printed without them. Included are words to 'Columbia" that help explain how Washington's Continental Army (largely New Englander-era) could triumph over such frightful physical handicaps as those of Valley Forge.

Songs to Cheer Men On

Much has been made of the military exploits of Cromwell's "Ironsides," whom he caused to do superhuman deeds by a coolly-calculated plan of making them equally good at drill and psalm-singing. There is the case, for example, of the relief of Gainsborough.

Cromwell's enemies were three times his own number, and on a hill, the base of which could be reached only through a gate which the enemy fire commanded. But Cromwell and his psalm-singing Ironsides swept through the gate and the bullets, on up the hill to victory. A good deal of credit is given the driving force of the religious inspiration in the psalms. But it must not be forgotten that Cromwell's Ironsides were specially well-armed, well-horsed, well-fed.

Surely the sorely-handicapped Continentals must have been psalm-singing soldiers, too, to a sufficient extent. What could not a ragged, hungry soldier do, under the urge of Billings' "Columbia"?

Not all the powers on earth,
Joined in a league with hell,
Can disconcert our plan,
Which nothing can excel,
Since such a friend in God we find,
Adieu to fears of every kind.

There is plenty of driving-force in the words which appeared for "Chester" tune in 1778:

Let tyrants shake their iron rod,
And slavery clank her galling chains;
We'll fear them not, we trust in God—
New England's God forever reigns.

Howe and Burgoyne and Clinton
With Prescott and Cornwallis join:
To plot our overthrow,
In one infernal league combine.

When God inspired us for the fight,
Their ranks were broke, their lines were forced,
Their ships were shattered in our sight,
Or swiftly driven from our coast.

In the book of 1778 Billings had a "Lamentation Over Boston":

By the rivers of Watertown we sat down and wept,
We wept, we wept, we wept,
When we remembered thee, O Boston.

Now, in army life, as some few citizens know, even one good singer in a company is a much-prized possession. But the indications are that in the American military outfits of the Revolution there were whole groups of New Englanders trained in part-singing, who cheered or filled with courage the hearts of their fellow-soldiers with Billings' tunes.

This sort of music would be doubly welcome in view of the scarcity and scant equipment of military bands among the Americans, compared with the musical resources of the British soldiers.

The New England Generals, Benjamin Lincoln and Nathaniel Greene, were in operations all the way from New England to the Carolinas, Georgia and Virginia. Soldiers like to serve with leaders who are their heroes, so the plea: "No doubt the reader will excuse my not adapting words to all the tunes, as it is attended with great inconvenience."

Mr Appel explained that in the early days purchasers of music books were just as well satisfied as not to hunt up, or originate, words that could be adapted to a new tune.

A Clew to the Words

In one place it looked as if Billings had printed words for a hymn, and then forgotten to supply the music. A poem by Dr Byles was shown under the reading, "New England Hymn." No music by that title could be found that many New Englanders must have served with them the length of the country.

It has been pointed out by musicologists that many negro spirituals were garbled versions of Methodist hymns. Perhaps they were also inspired by Billings' tunes. At least, the spirituals make frequent use of "Hallelujas"—and Billings wrote several Halleluja choruses.

Rediscovery of "America"

How the American patriotic anthem, "America," was rediscovered by Arthur Fiedler is an interesting little story in itself.

Richard G. Appel, music librarian of the Boston Public Library and lecturer on the history of music in America at Boston University, invited the orchestra leader to look over some of the library's rare examples of the first music printed in America.

Some difficulty was encountered by the musician in following the old-fashioned, crudely engraved notation of Billings' "New England Psalm-Singer." He was also uncertain about some of the intended effects of the self-taught composer—who, by the way, is said by legend to have worked out his musical inspirations with chalk on pieces of leather in the tannery where he worked. Seeking enlightenment, Mr Fiedler began exploring quaint little parenthetical remarks and footnotes scattered by Billings here and there through his pages of music.

Billings was evidently a very impulsive fellow. He handled some problems of book-making one way, some another. Here he supplied words with his tunes, and elsewhere printed tunes without other word except a title.

RICHARD S. APPEL
Music librarian, Boston Public Library, who aided Mr Fiedler in the discovery of the American "America."

At the bottom of one page the orchestra leader found, in faint lettering, in the volume. Then Fiedler, faithful to his policy of tracking down all available explanatory matter, spied a note in small, faded print, between parentheses: "Adopted (sic) to America tune."

And, sure enough, one full page of music without words bore the barely legible title "America." It was arranged for four voices.

Softly the conductor began whistling the notes of one staff, as, piano-playing fashion, he drubbed on a library table to get the effect of the other three voices. Breaking off, he tried to fit the words to the notes, then halted and stared, puzzled. Mr Appel came to the rescue by offering the use of the piano in the lecture hall.

Experiment showed that the melody was carried by the alto voice, rather than the soprano or tenor, as would be

Continued on the Sixth Page

"AMERICA"
As Sung in 1776

To Thee the tuneful anthem soars,
To Thee, our fathers' God and ours;
This wilderness we chose our seat:
To right secured by equal laws.
From Persecution's iron claws
We here have sought our calm retreat.

"AMERICA"
As We Know It

My country, 'tis of thee,
Sweet land of liberty,
Of thee I sing.
Land where my fathers died
Land of the Pilgrims' pride,
From every mountain side
Let freedom ring.

ARTHUR FIEDLER TRYING OUT THE ANTHEM

Use the Globe's Classified columns to Sell or Rent Real Estate. Read the Real Estate advts today.

Wonderful Self Control

Mrs Naggs—John, if I should die I don't believe you would know what to do.

Mr Naggs—Well, perhaps I wouldn't, but I hardly believe I would feel as good as that, Jane.—New Bedford Standard.

REDUCTION

RATIO

18x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

February 15, 1930

Arthur Fiedler to Conduct Boston Symphony "Pop" Concerts

For the first time in their long history, the famous Boston Symphony "Pop" Concerts will be conducted this season by a native of that city. Arthur Fiedler, long regarded as the most versatile member of the Boston

ARTHUR FIEDLER

Symphony Orchestra, has that distinction according to an announcement given to the press last Tuesday, and announced briefly in last week's issue of the MUSICAL COURIER.

Born in Boston about thirty-five years ago and educated at the Boston Latin School, young Fiedler was then sent to Berlin, where he studied the violin with Willy Hess, also piano, composition and conducting at the Hochschule für Musik. When the War broke out he returned to this country and joined the violin section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Karl Muck. Patrons of that tonal organization have known Arthur Fiedler as violinist, viola player, organist, pianist, celesta player, and even as tympanist; and Boston music lovers generally have known him, besides, as a piano accompanist of skill, musicianship and taste, and as an uncommonly able choral conductor. He comes by his musical gifts honestly since his father was for twenty-five years a violinist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a member of the original Kneisel Quartet. In addition to his talents as musician Mr. Fiedler has been admired by the ladies of the Massachusetts capital as a personable young man.....

Commenting on his selection for this important post, H. T. Parker, eminent critic of the Boston Transcript, expressed himself as follows:

"No easy task faces Arthur Fiedler, announced this morning as conductor of the Pop Concerts through next spring and summer. The balance of the programs has admittedly gone awry. A new conductor must restore the happy proportion between light and serious numbers, between classic, modern and popular items, to which relation the Pops have long owed their vogue. There are many publics to please; some indeed to be won back after a year or two of abstinence; one or another, perhaps, to be restrained, since it would have the concerts too routined and muted.

"Fortunately, Mr. Fiedler knows them all. Like them, he is native to this town—the first conductor of the 'Pops' to be such. Fortunately also, he is a musician of flexible mind and wide-ranging taste, asking only of a given piece that it be of interest and merit in the kind, whether Beethoven or George Gershwin, the signatory. He has also the

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK ZITS
FEB 15 1930

Fiedler Chosen to Direct "Pop" Concerts in Boston

Boston, Feb. 10.—Arthur Fiedler, Boston pianist, viola player in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been chosen as the conductor of the series of "Pop" Concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next spring and summer after the close of the regular symphony concerts. The "Pops" are a Boston institution of the first order. In fact, Boston is the only city in the country where year in year out "Pops" are given, with smoking and drinking permitted—that is the only city where the institution has been kept in vogue for many years without going "rowdy."

For two sesons, the "Pops" have been conducted by Afreddo Casella, Italian pianist, conductor and composer, who created almost a sensation at his first performances. He absolutely refused, however, to play any light music or operatic selections confining his program to symphonic music and to compositions of very high grade, written and not transcribed, for the orchestra.

161

Boston Sunday Globe Editorial and News Feature Section

SUNDAY, APRIL 6, 1930 1

DIFFERENT WORDS AND MUSIC ON EARLIER "AMERICA" JUST DISCOVERED

Sung in Revolution---Arthur Fiedler Finds Anthem of William Billings of Boston---Composer Wrote His Notes on Leather With Chalk---Paul Revere Decorated His Psalm Books

By LANNING HUMPHREY.

"AMERICA" was once a real American patriotic anthem, and not a new title for the British tune, "God Save Our Gracious King," sung to the words, "My country, 'tis of thee, Sweet land of Liberty, Of thee I sing."

This fact, just brought to light in Boston, offers a new and highly interesting answer to the query of harried tercentenary committees:

"What did New England soldiers of the Revolution sing for a national anthem?"

Song of the Spirit of '76

Of course you know that picture, "The Spirit of '76," showing a white-haired drummer striding along, flanked on his left by a man of the next generation—maybe his son—blowing a fife, and flanked on his right by a boy drummer—perhaps his grandson. Have you ever wondered what they were playing? Have you ever wondered what the real soldiers of the Revolution liked for music?

Most people would be inclined to say, "Yankee Doodle." And the tune, from somewhere in Britain, is older than the Revolution, and Yankee words were fitted to it when the colonists were gathering their army in Cambridge. But Billings' "America," and a number of other tunes of his, undoubtedly competed with "Yankee Doodle."

Old "America" Sung Everywhere

For years before the British "America" made its first appearance in a music book the American "America" held sway. Countless thousands sang it in church and camp before, during and after the Revolution. This tune held a grip on the public that caused it to reappear in a succession of music books after other one-time favorites ceased to be printed.

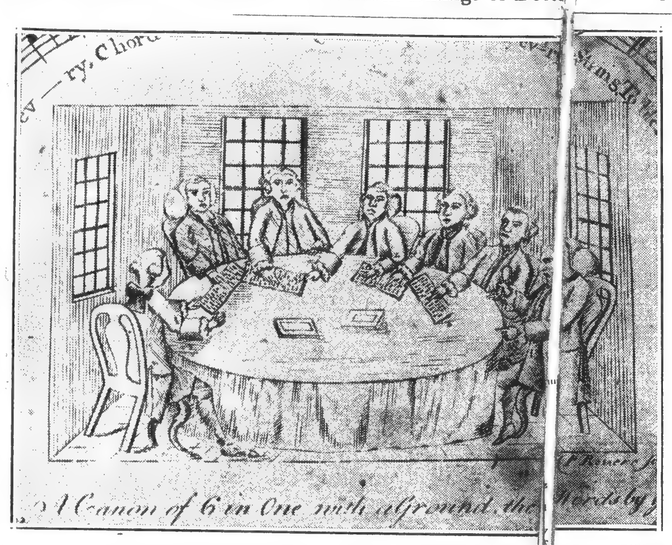
The old "America" was composed by William Billings, Boston-born tanner-singing master, author-composer. He produced the first book of music made up entirely of original compositions of an American—his "New England Psalm-Singer; or, American Chorister," printed in Boston in 1770. His "America" was first published in this collection. The first book to include the other "America" did not appear until 1843. (Smith & Stow's "Psalmist" was the book.)

Although later appearing in the guise of a hymn, the American "America" was originally published by Billings, it now appears, as a patriotic anthem. However, the words were not printed under the musical notation. Furthermore, they bore the title, "New England Hymn."

By a chance discovery Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the "Pops" and Esplanade concerts, has just rediscovered the fact that Billings' tune, "America," originally belonged to the "New England Hymn." In this form, soldiers of the Continental Army must have sung "America."

First Stanza of Song

It was a vigorous tune. Here are the words of the first of the three stanzas (for the general run of the public seem to follow a rule never to pay attention to any but the



The time beater in this old engraving, signed by Paul Revere, may be intended to represent Billings.

Canon of 6 in One with a Ground. the first stanza of a patri-

eful anthem soars.
fathers' God and ours:
we chose our seat:
tion's iron claws
ought our calm retreat.

stated that many of
"were sung and played
England troops were

Reporter, printed in s: "Many New Eng-

otic anthem):

To Thee the tun
To Thee, our
This wilderness
To right secu
From Persecu
We here have Mr Fiedler's
porter on into has yielded matter.

One old boo
Billings' tunes wherever New stationed."

In the Music
1841, appears

land soldiers encamped in the South during the Revolution had many of his (Billings') popular tunes by heart, and frequently amused themselves by singing them in camp, to the delight of all who heard.

"A gentleman now living in Philadelphia, distinguished for his great literary attainments, as well as for his musical tastes, often speaks of the great pleasure he enjoyed from this source during that period; and that the name of Billings has been very dear to him, and associated with the happiest recollections, even to the present time."

A Song of His at Trenton

Everyone remembers the picturesque circumstances of Washington's capture of Trenton. It was Christmas night . . . Hessians, well-clothed, well-sheltered from wind and hard-driven snow, well fed, making merry with more food, with wine, with singing . . . Then all confusion, murderous rifle-fire, panic and rout. In the face of a suddenly-appearing army of tattered, underfed, storm-benumbed patriots.

There were New Englanders among the victors. Glover's Marblehead fishermen had ferried Washington and his contingent across on the surprise attack. Gen Greene of Rhode Island was there, with New Englanders in his command. In jubilation, and in thanksgiving, would they not have sung Billings' tune of Boston for which he specified Watt's Christmas poem as suitable words?

Shepherds, rejoice, lift up your eyes!

Two years after the Declaration of Independence, Billings published his second book, with words fited to several of his earlier tunes which had first been printed without them. Included are words to 'Columbia" that help explain how Washington's Continental Army (largely New Englander-a) could triumph over such frightful physical handicaps as those of Valley Forge.

Songs to Cheer Men On

Much has been made of the military exploits of Cromwell's "Ironsides," whom he caused to do superhuman deeds by a coolly-calculated plan of making them equally good at drill and psalm-singing. There is the case, for example, of the relief of Gainsborough.

Cromwell's enemies were three times his own number, and on a hill, the base of which could be reached only through a gate which the enemy fire commanded. But Cromwell and his psalm-singing Ironsides swept through the gate and the bullets, on up the hill to victory. A good deal of credit is given the driving force of the religious inspiration in the psalms. But it must not be forgotten that Cromwell's Ironsides were specially well-armed, well-horsed, well-fed.

Surely the sorely-handicapped Continentals must have been psalm-singing soldiers, too, to a sufficient extent. What could not a ragged, hungry soldier do, under the urge of Billings' "Columbia"?

Not all the powers on earth,
Joined in a league with hell,
Can disconcert our plan,
Which nothing can excel.
Since such a friend in God we find,
Adieu to fears of every kind.

There is plenty of driving-force in the words which appeared for "Chester" tune in 1778:

Let tyrants shake their iron rod,
And slavery clank her galling chains:
We'll fear them not, we trust in God—
New England's God forever reigns.

Howe and Burgoyne and Clinton
With Prescott and Cornwallis join:
To plot our overthrow.
In one infernal league combine.

When God inspired us for the fight,
Their ranks were broke, their lines were forced,
Their ships were shattered in our sight,
Or swiftly driven from our coast.

In the book of 1778 Billings had a "Lamentation Over Boston":

By the rivers of Watertown we sat down and wept,
We wept, we wept, we wept,
When we remembered thee, O Boston.

Now, in army life, as some few citizens know, even one good singer in a company is a much-prized possession. But the indications are that in the American military outfits of the Revolution there were whole groups of New Englanders trained in part-singing, who cheered or filled with courage the hearts of their fellow-soldiers with Billings' tunes.

This sort of music would be doubly welcome in view of the scarcity and scant equipment of military bands among the Americans, compared with the musical resources of the British soldiers.

"AMERICA"
As Sung in 1776

To Thee the tuneful anthem soars,
To Thee, our fathers' God and ours;
This wilderness we chose our seat:
To right secured by equal laws.
From Persecution's iron claws
We here have sought our calm retreat.

"AMERICA"
As We Know It

My country, 'tis of thee,
Sweet land of liberty,
Of thee I sing.
Land where my fathers died
Land of the Pilgrims' pride,
From every mountain side
Let freedom ring.

ARTHUR FIEDLER TRYING OUT THE ANTHEM

The New England Generals, Benjamin Lincoln and Nathaniel Greene, were in operations all the way from New England to the Carolinas, Georgia and Virginia. Soldiers like to serve with leaders who are their heroes, so the plea: "No doubt the reader will excuse my not adapting words to all the tunes, as it is attended with great inconvenience."

Mr Appel explained that in the early days purchasers of music books were just as well satisfied as not to hunt up, or originate, words that could be adapted to a new tune.

A Clew to the Words

In one place it looked as if Billings had printed words for a hymn, and then forgotten to supply the music. A poem by Dr Byles was shown under the reading, "New England Hymn." No music by that title could be found that many New Englanders must have served with them the length of the country.

It has been pointed out by musicologists that many negro spirituals were garbled versions of Methodist hymns. Perhaps they were also inspired by Billings' tunes. At least, the spirituals make frequent use of "Hallelujas"—and Billings wrote several Halleluja choruses.

Rediscovery of "America"

How the American patriotic anthem, "America," was rediscovered by Arthur Fiedler is an interesting little story in itself.

Richard G. Appel, music librarian of the Boston Public Library and lecturer on the history of music in America at Boston University, invited the orchestra leader to look over some of the library's rare examples of the first music printed in America.

Some difficulty was encountered by the musician in following the old-fashioned, crudely engraved notation of Billings' "New England Psalm-Singer." He was also uncertain about some of the intended effects of the self-taught composer—who, by the way, is said by legend to have worked out his musical inspirations with chalk on pieces of leather in the tannery where he worked. Seeking enlightenment, Mr Fiedler began exploring quaint little parenthetical remarks and footnotes scattered by Billings here and there through his pages of music.

Billings was evidently a very impulsive fellow. He handled some problems of book-making one way, some another. Here he supplied words with his tunes, and elsewhere printed tunes without other word except a title.

RICHARD S. APPEL
Music librarian, Boston Public Library, who aided Mr Fiedler in the discovery of the American "America."

At the bottom of one page the orchestra leader found, in faint lettering, in the volume. Then Fiedler, faithful to his policy of tracking down all available explanatory matter, spied a note in small, faded print, between parentheses: "Adopted (sic) to America tune."

And, sure enough, one full page of music without words bore the barely legible title "America." It was arranged for four voices.

Softly the conductor began whistling the notes of one staff, as, piano-playing fashion, he drubbed on a library table to get the effect of the other three voices. Breaking off, he tried to fit the words to the notes, then halted and stared, puzzled. Mr Appel came to the rescue by offering the use of the piano in the lecture hall.

Experiment showed that the melody was carried by the alto voice, rather than the soprano or tenor, as would be

Continued on the Sixth Page

POPS OPEN MAY 7

With Arthur Fiedler as their new conductor, the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall will begin at the expiration of the regular Symphony season, Wednesday, May 7, will be the opening night. This will be the 45th season of Boston's warm weather concerts, which have no counterpart in America. Arthur Fiedler will be the first native Bostonian to conduct the Pops. The son of Emanuel Fiedler, a violinist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra for many years and one of the original members of the Kneisel string quartet, Arthur Fiedler has likewise played in this orchestra for a number of seasons. He is known as a conductor of chamber music concerts, as the leader of the Cecilia Society Chorus, as pianist, and more particularly by the Esplanade concerts of last summer which he organized and conducted. Fiedler's programs at the Pops will include every type of music which is desired by the Pops public and suitable to a symphony orchestra.

According to Pops traditions, refreshments will be served in the course of the concerts at the tables which will cover the floor of Symphony Hall. The Pops will be given each night and on alternate Sundays through May and June.

Use the Globe's Classified columns to Sell or Rent Real Estate. Read the Real Estate advts today.

Wonderful Self Control

Mrs Naggs—John, if I should die I don't believe you would know what to do.

Mr Naggs—Well, perhaps I wouldn't, but I hardly believe I would feel as good as that, Jane.—New Bedford Standard.

February 15, 1930

Arthur Fiedler to Conduct Boston Symphony "Pop" Concerts

For the first time in their long history, the famous Boston Symphony "Pop" Concerts will be conducted this season by a native of that city. Arthur Fiedler, long regarded as the most versatile member of the Boston

ARTHUR FIEDLER

Symphony Orchestra, has that distinction according to an announcement given to the press last Tuesday, and announced briefly in last week's issue of the MUSICAL COURIER.

Born in Boston about thirty-five years ago and educated at the Boston Latin School, young Fiedler was then sent to Berlin, where he studied the violin with Willy Hess, also piano, composition and conducting at the Hochschule für Musik. When the War broke out he returned to this country and joined the violin section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Karl Muck. Patrons of that tonal organization have known Arthur Fiedler as violinist, viola player, organist, pianist, celesta player, and even as tympanist; and Boston music lovers generally have known him, besides, as a piano accompanist of skill, musicianship and taste, and as an uncommonly able choral conductor. He comes by his musical gifts honestly since his father was for twenty-five years a violinist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a member of the original Kneisel Quartet. In addition to his talents as musician Mr. Fiedler has been admired by the ladies of the Massachusetts capital as a personable young man.....

Commenting on his selection for this important post, H. T. Parker, eminent critic of the Boston Transcript, expressed himself as follows:

"No easy task faces Arthur Fiedler, announced this morning as conductor of the Pop Concerts through next spring and summer. The balance of the programs has admittedly gone awry. A new conductor must restore the happy proportion between light and serious numbers, between classic, modern and popular items, to which relation the Pops have long owed their vogue. There are many publics to please; some indeed to be won back after a year or two of abstinence; one or another, perhaps, to be restrained, since it would have the concerts too routined and muted.

"Fortunately, Mr. Fiedler knows them all. Like them, he is native to this town—the first conductor of the 'Pops' to be such. Fortunately also, he is a musician of flexible mind and wide-ranging taste, asking only of a given piece that it be of interest and merit in the kind, whether Beethoven or George Gershwin is the signature. He has also the knack of pleasing an audience without yielding too often or too much to its chance whims. He knows his men and they work for him. It is an open secret that of late he has revitalized the chorus of The Cecilia. By the same token it is his turn to revitalize the 'Pops,' of late gone dull. Three months more and most of us may be applauding not only Bolero but also Strike Up the Band."

many years without going crowdy."

For two seasons, the "Pops" have been conducted by Afredo Casella, Italian pianist, conductor and composer, who created almost a sensation at his first performances. He absolutely refused, however, to play any light music or operatic selections confining his program to symphonic music and to compositions of very high grade, written and not transcribed, for the orchestra.

1617

Boston Sunday Globe Editorial and News Feature Section

SUNDAY, APRIL 6, 1930 1

DIFFERENT WORDS AND MUSIC IN EARLIER "AMERICA" JUST DISCOVERED

Sung in Revolution---Arthur Fiedler Finds Anthem of William Billings of Boston---Composer Wrote His Notes on Leather With Chalk---Paul Revere Decorated His Psalm Books

By LANNING HUMPHREY

"AMERICA" was once a real American patriotic anthem, and not a new title for the British tune, "God Save Our Gracious King," sung to the words, "My country, 'tis of thee, Sweet land of Liberty, Of thee I sing."

This fact, just brought to light in Boston, offers a new and highly interesting answer to the query of harried tercentenary committees:

"What did New England soldiers of the Revolution sing for a national anthem?"

Song of the Spirit of '76

Of course you know that picture, "The Spirit of '76," showing a white-haired drummer striding along, flanked on his left by a man of the next generation—maybe his son—blowing a fife, and flanked on his right by a boy drummer—perhaps his grandson. Have you ever wondered what they were playing? Have you ever wondered what the real soldiers of the Revolution liked for music?

Most people would be inclined to say, "Yankee Doodle." And the tune, from somewhere in Britain, is older than the Revolution, and Yankee words were fitted to it when the colonists were gathering their army in Cambridge. But Billings' "America," and a number of other tunes of his, undoubtedly competed with "Yankee Doodle."

Old "America" Sung Everywhere

For years before the British "America" made its first appearance in a music book the American "America" held sway. Countless thousands sang it in church and camp before, during and after the Revolution. This tune held a grip on the public that caused it to reappear in a succession of music books after other one-time favorites ceased to be printed.

The old "America" was composed by William Billings, Boston-born tanner-singing master, author-composer. He produced the first book of music made up entirely of original compositions of an American—his "New England Psalm-Singer: or, American Chorister," printed in Boston in 1770. His "America" was first published in this collection. The first book to include the other "America" did not appear until 1843. (Smith & Stow's "Psalmist" was the book.)

Although later appearing in the guise of a hymn, the American "America" was originally published by Billings, it now appears, as a patriotic anthem. However, the words were not printed under the musical notation. Furthermore, they bore the title, "New England Hymn."

By a chance discovery Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the "Pops" and Esplanade concerts, has just rediscovered the fact that Billings' tune, "America," originally belonged to the "New England Hymn." In this form, soldiers of the Continental Army must have sung "America."

First Stanza of Song

It was a vigorous tune. Here are the words of the first of the three stanzas (for the general run of the public seem to follow a rule never to pay attention to any but the first stanza of a patriotic anthem):

"To Thee the tuneful anthem soars.
To Thee, our fathers' God and ours:
This wilderness we chose our seat:
To right secured by equal laws.
From Persecution's iron claws
We here have sought our calm retreat."

The time beater in this old engraving, signed by Paul Revere, may be intended to represent Billings.

Mr Fiedler's discovery drew the report on into a line of research that has yielded some highly interesting matter.

One old book of Billings' tunes stated that many of wherever New England troops were stationed."

In the Musical Reporter, printed in 1841, appears this: "Many New England soldiers encamped in the South during the Revolution had many of his (Billings') popular tunes by heart, and frequently amused themselves by singing them in camp, to the delight of all who heard.

"A gentleman now living in Philadelphia, distinguished for his great literary attainments, as well as for his musical tastes, often speaks of the great pleasure he enjoyed from this source during that period; and that the name of Billings has been very dear to him, and associated with the happiest recollections, even to the present time."

A Song of His at Trenton

Everyone remembers the picturesque circumstances of Washington's capture of Trenton. It was Christmas night . . . Hessians, well-clothed, well-sheltered from wind and hard-driven snow, well fed, making merry with more food, with wine, with singing . . . Then all confusion, murderous rifle-fire, panic and rout, in the face of a suddenly-appearing army of tattered, underfed, storm-benumbed patriots.

There were New Englanders among the victors. Glover's Marblehead fishermen had ferried Washington and his contingent across on the surprise attack. Gen Greene of Rhode Island was there, with New Englanders in his command. In jubilation, and in thanksgiving, would they not have sung Billings' tune of Boston for which he specified Watt's Christmas poem as suitable words?

Shepherds, rejoice, lift up your eyes!

Two years after the Declaration of Independence, Billings published his second book, with words fited to several of his earlier tunes which had first been printed without them. Included are words to 'Columbia" that help explain how Washington's Continental Army (largely New Englanders) could triumph over such frightful physical handicaps as those of Valley Forge.

Songs to Cheer Men On

Much has been made of the military exploits of Cromwell's "Ironsides," whom he caused to do superhuman deeds by a coolly-calculated plan of making them equally good at drill and psalm-singing. There is the case, for example, of the relief of Gainsborough.

Cromwell's enemies were three times his own number, and on a hill, the base of which could be reached only through a gate which the enemy fire commanded. But Cromwell and his psalm-singing Ironsides swept through the gate and the bullets, on up the hill to victory. A good deal of credit is given the driving force of the religious inspiration in the psalms. But it must not be forgotten that Cromwell's Ironsides were specially well-armed, well-horsed, well-fed.

Surely the sorely-handicapped Continentals must have been psalm-singing soldiers, too, to a sufficient extent. What could not a ragged, hungry soldier do, under the urge of Billings' "Columbia"?

No, all the powers on earth,
Joined in a league with hell,
Can disconcert our plan,
Which nothing can excel,
Since such a friend in God we find,
Adieu to fears of every kind.

There is plenty of driving-force in the words which appeared for "Chester" tune in 1778:

Let tyrants shake their iron rod,
And slavery clank her galling chains;
We'll fear them not, we trust in God—
New England's God forever reigns.

Howe and Burgoyne and Clinton
With Prescott and Cornwallis join:
To plot our overthrow,
In one infernal league combine.

When God inspired us for the fight,
Their ranks were broke, their lines were forced,
Their ships were shattered in our sight,
Or swiftly driven from our coast.

In the book of 1778 Billings had a "Lamentation Over Boston":

By the rivers of Watertown we sat down and wept,
We wept, we wept, we wept,
When we remembered thee, O Boston.

Now, in army life, as some few citizens know, even one good singer in a company is a much-prized possession. But the indications are that in the American military outfits of the Revolution there were whole groups of New Englanders trained in part-singing, who cheered or filled with courage the hearts of their fellow-soldiers with Billings' tunes.

This sort of music would be doubly welcome in view of the scarcity and scant equipment of military bands among the Americans, compared with the musical resources of the British soldiers.

"AMERICA"
As Sung in 1776

To Thee the tuneful anthem soars,
To Thee, our fathers' God and ours;
This wilderness we chose our seat:
To right secured by equal laws.
From Persecution's iron claws
We here have sought our calm retreat.

"AMERICA"
As We Know It

My country, 'tis of thee,
Sweet land of liberty,
Of thee I sing.
Land where my fathers died
Land of the Pilgrims' pride,
From every mountain side
Let freedom ring.

ARTHUR FIEDLER TRYING OUT THE ANTHEM

The New England Generals, Benjamin Lincoln and Nathaniel Greene, were in operations all the way from New England to the Carolinas, Georgia and Virginia. Soldiers like to serve with leaders who are their heroes, so the plea: "No doubt the reader will excuse my not adapting words to all the tunes, as it is attended with great inconvenience."

Mr Appel explained that in the early days purchasers of music books were just as well satisfied as not to hunt up, or originate, words that could be adapted to a new tune.

A Clew to the Words

In one place it looked as if Billings had printed words for a hymn, and then forgotten to supply the music. A poem by Dr Byles was shown under the reading, "New England Hymn." No music by that title could be found that many New Englanders must have served with them the length of the country.

It has been pointed out by musicologists that many negro spirituals were garbled versions of Methodist hymns. Perhaps they were also inspired by Billings' tunes. At least, the spirituals make frequent use of "Hallelujas"—and Billings wrote several Hallelujah choruses.

Rediscovery of "America"

How the American patriotic anthem, "America," was rediscovered by Arthur Fiedler is an interesting little story in itself.

Richard G. Appel, music librarian of the Boston Public Library and lecturer on the history of music in America at Boston University, invited the orchestra leader to look over some of the library's rare examples of the first music printed in America.

Some difficulty was encountered by the musician in following the old-fashioned, crudely engraved notation of Billings' "New England Psalm-Singer." He was also uncertain about some of the intended effects of the self-taught composer—who, by the way, is said by legend to have worked out his musical inspirations with chalk on pieces of leather in the tannery where he worked. Seeking enlightenment, Mr Fiedler began exploring quaint little parenthetical remarks and footnotes scattered by Billings here and there through his pages of music.

Billings was evidently a very impulsive fellow. He handled some problems of book-making one way, some another. Here he supplied words with his tunes, and elsewhere printed tunes without other word except a title.

RICHARD G. APPEL
Music librarian, Boston Public Library, who aided Mr Fiedler in the discovery of the American "America."

At the bottom of one page the orchestra leader found, in faint lettering, in the volume. Then Fiedler, faithful to his policy of tracking down all available explanatory matter, spied a note in small, faded print, between parentheses: "Adopted (sic) to America tune."

And, sure enough, one full page of music without words bore the barely legible title "America." It was arranged for four voices.

Softly the conductor began whistling the notes of one staff, as piano-playing fashion, he drubbed on a library table to get the effect of the other three voices. Breaking off, he tried to fit the words to the notes, then halted and stared, puzzled. Mr Appel came to the rescue by offering the use of the piano in the lecture hall.

Experiment showed that the melody was carried by the alto voice, rather than the soprano or tenor, as would be

Continued on the Sixth Page

POPS OPEN MAY 7

With Arthur Fiedler as their new conductor, the Pop Concerts in Symphony hall will begin at the expiration of the regular Symphony season, Wednesday, May 7, will be the opening night. This will be the 45th season of Boston's warm weather concerts, which have no counterpart in America. Arthur Fiedler will be the first native Bostonian to conduct the Pops. The son of Emanuel Fiedler, a violinist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra for many years and one of the original members of the Kneisel string quartet, Arthur Fiedler has likewise played in this orchestra for a number of seasons. He is known as a conductor of chamber music concerts, as the leader of the Cecilia Society Chorus, as pianist, and more particularly by the Esplanade concerts of last summer which he organized and conducted. Fiedler's programs at the Pops will include every type of music which is desired by the Pops public and suitable to a symphony orchestra.

According to Pops traditions, refreshments will be served in the course of the concerts at the tables which will cover the floor of Symphony Hall. The Pops will be given each night and on alternate Sundays through May and June.

Use the Globe's Classified columns to Sell or Rent Real Estate. Read the Real Estate advts today.

Wonderful Self Control

Mrs Naggs—John, if I should die I don't believe you would know what to do.

Mr Naggs—Well, perhaps I wouldn't, but I hardly believe I would feel as good as that, Jane.—New Bedford Standard.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

February 15, 1930

Arthur Fiedler to Conduct Boston Symphony "Pop" Concerts

For the first time in their long history, the famous Boston Symphony "Pop" Concerts will be conducted this season by a native of that city. Arthur Fiedler, long regarded as the most versatile member of the Boston

ARTHUR FIEDLER

Symphony Orchestra, has that distinction according to an announcement given to the press last Tuesday, and announced briefly in last week's issue of the MUSICAL COURIER.

Born in Boston about thirty-five years ago and educated at the Boston Latin School, young Fiedler was then sent to Berlin, where he studied the violin with Willy Hess, also piano, composition and conducting at the Hochschule für Musik. When the War broke out he returned to this country and joined the violin section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Karl Muck. Patrons of that tonal organization have known Arthur Fiedler as violinist, viola player, organist, pianist, celesta player, and even as tympanist; and Boston music lovers generally have known him, besides, as a piano accompanist of skill, musicianship and taste, and as an uncommonly able choral conductor. He comes by his musical gifts honestly since his father was for twenty-five years a violinist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a member of the original Kneisel Quartet. In addition to his talents as musician Mr. Fiedler has been admired by the ladies of the Massachusetts capital as a personable young man.....

Commenting on his selection for this important post, H. T. Parker, eminent critic of the Boston Transcript, expressed himself as follows:

"No easy task faces Arthur Fiedler, announced this morning as conductor of the Pop Concerts through next spring and summer. The balance of the programs has admittedly gone awry. A new conductor must restore the happy proportion between light and serious numbers, between classic, modern and popular items, to which relation the Pops have long owed their vogue. There are many publics to please; some indeed to be won back after a year or two of abstinence; one or another, perhaps, to be restrained, since it would have the concerts too routined and muted.

"Fortunately, Mr. Fiedler knows them all. Like them, he is native to this town—the first conductor of the 'Pops' to be such. Fortunately also, he is a musician of flexible mind and wide-ranging taste, asking only of a given piece that it be of interest and merit in the kind, whether Beethoven or George Gershwin is the signature. He has also the

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK ZITS

FEB 15 1930

Fiedler Chosen to Direct "Pop" Concerts in Boston

Boston, Feb. 10.—Arthur Fiedler, Boston pianist, viola player in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been chosen as the conductor of the series of "Pop" Concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next spring and summer after the close of the regular symphony concerts. The "Pops" are a Boston institution of the first order. In fact, Boston is the only city in the country where year in year out "Pops" are given, with smoking and drinking permitted—that is the only city where the institution has been kept in vogue for many years without going "rowdy."

For two sesons, the "Pops" have been conducted by Afreddo Casella, Italian pianist, conductor and composer, who created almost a sensation at his first performances. He absolutely refused, however, to play any light music or operatic selections confining his program to symphonic music and to compositions of very high grade, written and not transcribed, for the orchestra.

1617

Boston Sunday Globe — Editorial and ...

SUNDAY, APRIL 6, 1930

DIFFERENT WORDS AND MUSIC ... N EARLIER

Sung in Revolution---Arthur Fiedler Finds Anthem of William Billings of Bost... ---Composer Wrote His No...

By LANNING HUMPHREY

"AMERICA" was once a real American patriotic anthem, and not a new title for the British tune, "God Save Our Gracious King," sung to the words. "My country, 'tis of thee, Sweet land of Liberty, Of thee I sing."

This fact, just brought to light in Boston, offers a new and highly interesting answer to the query of harried tercentenary committees:

"What did New England soldiers of the Revolution sing for a national anthem?"

Song of the Spirit of '76

Of course you know that picture, "The Spirit of '76," showing a white-haired drummer striding along, flanked on his left by a man of the next generation—maybe his son—blowing a fife, and flanked on his right by a boy drummer—perhaps his grandson. Have you ever wondered what they were playing? Have you ever wondered what the real soldiers of the Revolution liked for music?

Most people would be inclined to say, "Yankee Doodle." And the tune, from somewhere in Britain, is older than the Revolution, and Yankee words were fitted to it when the colonists were gathering their army in Cambridge. But Billings' "America," and a number of other tunes of his, undoubtedly competed with "Yankee Doodle."

The time beater in this old engraving, signed by Paul Revere, may be intended to represent Billings, composer of the earlier "America."

Old "America" Sung Everywhere

For years before the British "America" made its first appearance in a music book the American "America" held sway. Countless thousands sang it in church and camp before, during and after the Revolution. This tune held a grip on the public that caused it to reappear in a succession of music books after other one-time favorites ceased to be printed.

The old "America" was composed by William Billings, Boston-born tanner-singing master, author-composer. He produced the first book of music made up entirely of original compositions of an American—his "New England Psalm-Singer: or, American Chorister," printed in Boston in 1770. His "America" was first published in this collection. The first book to include the other "America" did not appear until 1843. (Smith & Stow's "Psalmist" was the book.)

Although later appearing in the guise of a hymn, the American "America" was originally published by Billings, it now appears, as a patriotic anthem. However, the words were not printed under the musical notation. Furthermore, they bore the title, "New England Hymn."

By a chance discovery Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the "Pops" and Esplanade concerts, has just rediscovered the fact that Billings' tune, "America," originally belonged to the "New England Hymn." In this form, soldiers of the Continental Army must have sung "America."

First Stanza of Song

It was a vigorous tune. Here are the words of the first of the three stanzas (for the general run of the public seem to follow a rule never to pay attention to any but the first stanza of a patriotic anthem):

To Thee the tuneful anthem soars.
To Thee, our fathers' God and ours;
This wilderness we chose our seat:
To right secured by equal laws.
From Persecution's iron claws
We here have sought our calm retreat.

Mr Fiedler's rediscovery, drew the reporter on into a line of research that has yielded some highly interesting matter.

One old book stated that many of Billings' tunes were sung and played wherever New England troops were stationed."

In the Musical Reporter, printed in 1841, appears this: "Many New England soldiers encamped in the during the Revolution had many (Billings') popular tunes by and frequently amused themselves singing them in camp, to the of all who heard.

"A gentleman now living in Philadelphia, distinguished for his greary attainments, as well as musical tastes, often speaks great pleasure he enjoyed from source during that period; and the name of Billings has been dear to him, and associated with happiest recollections, even present time."

A Song of His at Trenton

Everyone remembers the picture circumstances of Washington's of Trenton. It was Christmas. . . . Hessians, well-clothed, well tered from wind and hard-driven well fed, making merry with food, with wine, with singing. Then all confusion, murderous fire, panic and rout, in the face suddenly-appearing army of the underfed, storm-benumbed pa...

There were New Englanders the victors. Glover's Marblehead men had ferried Washington's contingent across on the surpr... tack. Gen Greene of Rhode Island there, with New Englanders command. In jubilation, and in giving, would they not have sung lings' tune of Boston for which specified Watt's Christmas po... suitable words?

Shepherds, rejoice, lift up your e...

Two years after the Declaration Independence, Billings publish... second book, with words fited ... eral of his earlier tunes which first been printed without the cluded are words to 'Columbia' help explain how Washington's tinental Army (largely New Eng... ers) could triumph over such f... physical handicaps as those of Forge.

Songs to Cheer Men On

Much has been made of the ... exploits of Cromwell's "Iron whom he caused to do super... deeds by a coolly-calculated ... making them equally good at d... psalm-singing. There is the ca... example, of the relief of Gainsb...

Cromwell's enemies were thre... his own number, and on a h... base of which could be reache... through a gate which the ene... commanded. But Cromwell a... psalm-singing Ironsides swept t... the gate and the bullets, on ...

POPS OPEN MAY 7

With Arthur Fiedler as their new conductor, the Pop Concerts in Symphony hall will begin at the expiration of the regular Symphony season. Wednesday, May 7, will be the opening night. This will be the 45th season of Boston's warm weather concerts, which have no counterpart in America. Arthur Fiedler will be the first native Bostonian to conduct the Pops. The son of Emanuel Fiedler, a violinist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra for many years and one of the original members of the Kneisel string quartet, Arthur Fiedler has likewise played in this orchestra for a number of seasons. He is known as a conductor of chamber music concerts, as the leader of the Cecilia Society Chorus, as pianist, and more particularly by the Esplanade concerts of last summer which he organized and conducted. Fiedler's programs at the Pops will include every type of music which is desired by the Pops public and suitable to a symphony orchestra.

According to Pops traditions, refreshments will be served in the course of the concerts at the tables which will cover the floor of Symphony Hall. The Pops will be given each night and on alternate Sundays through May and June.

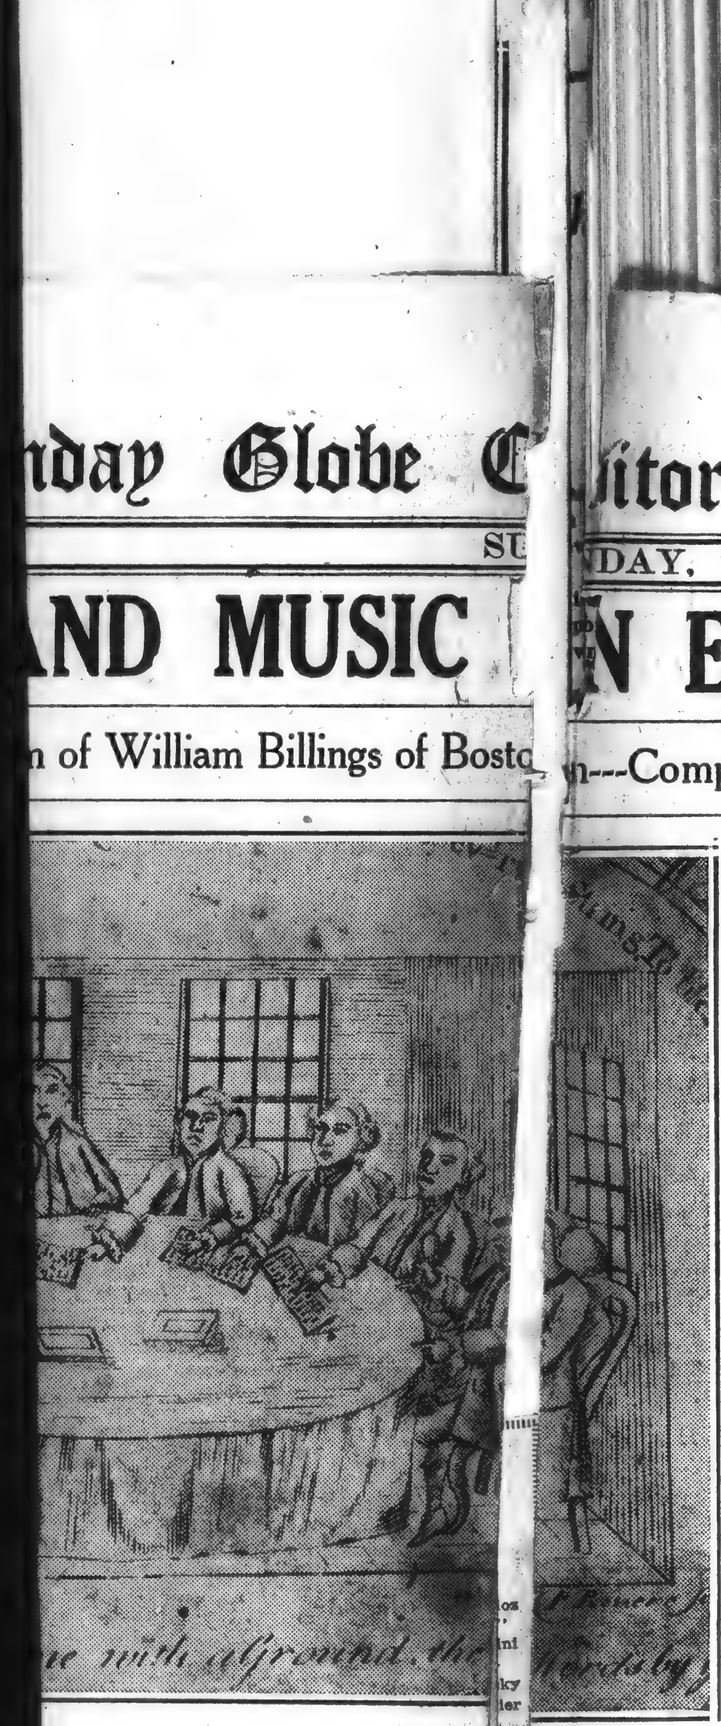
1617

nday Globe C Editorial and News Feature Section

SU DAY, APRIL 6, 1930 1

ND MUSIC N EARLIER "AMERICA" JUST DISCOVERED

n of William Billings of Bosto n---Composer Wrote His Notes on Leather With Chalk---Paul Revere Decorated His Psalm Books



d by Paul Revere, may be intended to represent Billings, of the earlier "America."

bore the title, "New Eng- " first stanza of a patrihance discovery Arthur ductor of the "Pops" and oncerts, has just rediscov- act that Billings' tune, originally belonged to the nd Hymn." In this form, he Continental Army must "America."

t Stanza of Song

igorous tune. Here are the first of the three stanzas eral run of the public seem ule never to pay attention to any but the otic anthem):

To Thee the tun
To Thee, our
This wilderness
To right secu
From Persecu
We here have s

Mr Fiedler's r porter on into has yielded so matter.

One old book Billings' tunes wherever New stationed."

In the Music 1841, appears akeful anthem soars.

sky fathers' God and ours:
we chose our seat:
red by equal laws.
tion's iron claws
ought our calm retreat.
rediscovery drew the re- a line of research that me highly interesting stated that many of "were sung and played England troops were l Reporter, printed in s: "Many New Eng-land soldiers encamped in the South during the Revolution had many of his (Billings') popular tunes by heart, and frequently amused themselves by singing them in camp, to the delight of all who heard.

"A gentleman now living in Philadelphia, distinguished for his great literary attainments, as well as for his musical tastes, often speaks of the great pleasure he enjoyed from this source during that period; and that the name of Billings has been very dear to him, and associated with the happiest recollections, even to the present time."

A Song of His at Trenton

Everyone remembers the picturesque circumstances of Washington's capture of Trenton. It was Christmas night . . . Hessians, well-clothed, well-sheltered from wind and hard-driven snow, well fed, making merry with more food, with wine, with singing . . . Then all confusion, murderous rifle-fire, panic and rout, in the face of a suddenly-appearing army of tattered, underfed, storm-benumbed patriots.

There were New Englanders among the victors. Glover's Marblehead fishermen had ferried Washington and his contingent across on the surprise attack. Gen Greene of Rhode Island was there, with New Englanders in his command. In jubilation, and in thanksgiving, would they not have sung Billings' tune of Boston for which he specified Watt's Christmas poem as suitable words?

Shepherds, rejoice, lift up your eyes!

Two years after the Declaration of Independence, Billings published his second book, with words fited to several of his earlier tunes which had first been printed without them. Included are words to 'Columbia" that help explain how Washington's Continental Army (largely New Englanders) could triumph over such frightful physical handicaps as those of Valley Forge.

Songs to Cheer Men On

Much has been made of the military exploits of Cromwell's "Ironsides," whom he caused to do superhuman deeds by a coolly-calculated plan of making them equally good at drill and psalm-singing. There is the case, for example, of the relief of Gainsborough.

Cromwell's enemies were three times his own number, and on a hill, the base of which could be reached only through a gate which the enemy fire commanded. But Cromwell and his psalm-singing Ironsides swept through the gate and the bullets, on up the hill to victory. A good deal of credit is given the driving force of the religious inspiration in the psalms. But it must not be forgotten that Cromwell's Ironsides were specially well-armed, well-horsed, well-fed.

Surely the sorely-handicapped Continentals must have been psalm-singing soldiers, too, to a sufficient extent. What could not a ragged, hungry soldier do, under the urge of Billings' "Columbia"?

Not all the powers on earth,
Joined in a league with hell,
Can disconcert our plan,
Which nothing can excel.
Since such a friend in God we find,
Adieu to fears of every kind.

There is plenty of driving-force in the words which appeared for "Chester" tune in 1778:

Let tyrants shake their iron rod,
And slavery clank her galling chains;
We'll fear them not, we trust in God—
New England's God forever reigns.

Howe and Burgoyne and Clinton
With Prescott and Cornwallis join:
To plot our overthrow,
In one infernal league combine.

When God inspired us for the fight,
Their ranks were broke, their lines were forced,
Their ships were shattered in our sight,
Or swiftly driven from our coast.

In the book of 1778 Billings had a "Lamentation Over Boston":

By the rivers of Watertown we sat down and wept,
We wept, we wept, we wept,
When we remembered thee, O Boston.

Now, in army life, as some few citizens know, even one good singer in a company is a much-prized possession. But the indications are that in the American military outfits of the Revolution there were whole groups of New Englanders trained in part-singing, who cheered or filled with courage the hearts of their fellow-soldiers with Billings' tunes.

This sort of music would be doubly welcome in view of the scarcity and scant equipment of military bands among the Americans, compared with the musical resources of the British soldiers.

"AMERICA"
As Sung in 1776

To Thee the tuneful anthem soars,
To Thee, our fathers' God and ours;
This wilderness we chose our seat:
To right secured by equal laws.
From Persecution's iron claws
We here have sought our calm retreat.

"AMERICA"
As We Know It

My country, 'tis of thee,
Sweet land of liberty,
Of thee I sing.
Land where my fathers died
Land of the Pilgrims' pride,
From every mountain side
Let freedom ring.

ARTHUR FIEDLER TRYING OUT THE ANTHEM

The New England Generals, Benjamin Lincoln and Nathaniel Greene, were in operations all the way from New England to the Carolinas, Georgia and Virginia. Soldiers like to serve with leaders who are their heroes, so the plea: "No doubt the reader will excuse my not adapting words to all the tunes, as it is attended with great inconveniency."

Mr Appel explained that in the early days purchasers of music books were just as well satisfied as not to hunt up, or originate, words that could be adapted to a new tune.

A Clew to the Words

In one place it looked as if Billings had printed words for a hymn, and then forgotten to supply the music. A poem by Dr Byles was shown under the reading, "New England Hymn." No music by that title could be found that many New Englanders must have served with them the length of the country.

It has been pointed out by musicologists that many negro spirituals were garbled versions of Methodist hymns. Perhaps they were also inspired by Billings' tunes. At least, the spirituals make frequent use of "Hallelujas"—and Billings wrote several Halleluja choruses.

Rediscovery of "America"

How the American patriotic anthem, "America," was rediscovered by Arthur Fiedler is an interesting little story in itself.

Richard G. Appel, music librarian of the Boston Public Library and lecturer on the history of music in America at Boston University, invited the orchestra leader to look over some of the library's rare examples of the first music printed in America.

Some difficulty was encountered by the musician in following the old-fashioned, crudely engraved notation of Billings' "New England Psalm-Singer." He was also uncertain about some of the intended effects of the self-taught composer—who, by the way, is said by legend to have worked out his musical inspirations with chalk on pieces of leather in the tannery where he worked. Seeking enlightenment, Mr Fiedler began exploring quaint

MAY 7
as their new ncerts in Symat the expira-
mphony season.
be the opening 45th season of concerts, which , America. Ar-
he first native
he Pops. The
, a violinist in Orchestra for of the original string quartet, wise played in umber of sea-
a conductor of
, as the leader
horus, as pianrly by the Es-summer which cted. Fiedler's ll include every desired by the le to a sym-

traditions, red in the course
bles which will hony Hall. The night and on
gh. May and n this old engraving, signed by Paul Revere, may be intended to represent Billings.

composer of the earlier "America."

r-composer. He of music made compositions of New England merican Chorist n in 1770. His ublished in this book to include did not appear ow's "Psalmist" ring in the guise ican "America"

ed by Billings,
atriotic anthem.
ere not printed ation. Furthermore, they bore the title, "New England Hymn."

By a chance discovery Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the "Pops" and Esplanade concerts, has just rediscovered the fact that Billings' tune, "America," originally belonged to the "New England Hymn." In this form, soldiers of the Continental Army must have sung "America."

First Stanza of Song

It was a vigorous tune. Here are the words of the first of the three stanzas (for the general run of the public seem to follow a rule never to pay attention to any but the first stanza of a patriotic anthem):

To Thee the fun
To Thee, our
This wilderness
To right secu
From Persecu
We here have s

Mr Fiedler's r
porter on into has yielded s
matter.

One old book
Billings' tunes wherever New stationed."

In the Music
1841, appears

eful anthem soars.
fathers' God and ours:
we chose our seat:
red by equal laws.
tion's iron claws
ought our calm retreat.
rediscovery drew the re-
a line of research that me highly interesting

stated that many of were sung and played
England troops were

Reporter, printed in s: "Many New Eng-

dear to him, and associated with the happiest recollections, even to the present time."

A Song of His at Trenton

Everyone remembers the picturesque circumstances of Washington's capture of Trenton. It was Christmas night . . . Hessians, well-clothed, well-sheltered from wind and hard-driven snow, well fed, making merry with more food, with wine, with singing . . . Then all confusion, murderous rifle-fire, panic and rout, in the face of a suddenly-appearing army of tattered, underfed, storm-benumbed patriots.

There were New Englanders among the victors. Glover's Marblehead fishermen had ferried Washington and his contingent across on the surprise attack. Gen Greene of Rhode Island was there, with New Englanders in his command. In jubilation, and in thanksgiving, would they not have sung Billings' tune of Boston for which he specified Watt's Christmas poem as suitable words?

Shepherds, rejoice, lift up your eyes!

Two years after the Declaration of Independence, Billings published his second book, with words fited to several of his earlier tunes which had first been printed without them. Included are words to 'Columbia" that help explain how Washington's Continental Army (largely New Englanders) could triumph over such frightful physical handicaps as those of Valley Forge.

Songs to Cheer Men On

Much has been made of the military exploits of Cromwell's "Ironsides," whom he caused to do superhuman deeds by a coolly-calculated plan of making them equally good at drill and psalm-singing. There is the case, for example, of the relief of Gainsborough.

Cromwell's enemies were three times his own number, and on a hill, the base of which could be reached only through a gate which the enemy fire commanded. But Cromwell and his psalm-singing Ironsides swept through the gate and the bullets, on up the hill to victory. A good deal of credit is given the driving force of the religious inspiration in the psalms. But it must not be forgotten that Cromwell's Ironsides were specially well-armed, well-horsed, well-fed.

Surely the sorely-handicapped Continentals must have been psalm-singing soldiers, too, to a sufficient extent. What could not a ragged, hungry soldier do, under the urge of Billings' "Columbia"?

Not all the powers on earth,
Joined in a league with hell,
Can disconcert our plan,
Which nothing can excel.
Since such a friend in God we find,
Adieu to fears of every kind.

There is plenty of driving-force in the words which appeared for "Chester" tune in 1778:

Let tyrants shake their iron rod,
And slavery clank her galling chains;
We'll fear them not, we trust in God—
New England's God forever reigns.

Howe and Burgoyne and Clinton
With Prescott and Cornwallis join:
To plot our overthrow,
In one infernal league combine.

When God inspired us for the fight,
Their ranks were broke, their lines were forced,
Their ships were shattered in our sight,
Or swiftly driven from our coast.

In the book of 1778 Billings had a "Lamentation Over Boston":

By the rivers of Watertown we sat down and wept,
We wept, we wept, we wept,
When we remembered thee, O Boston.

Now, in army life, as some few citizens know, even one good singer in a company is a much-prized possession. But the indications are that in the American military outfits of the Revolution there were whole groups of New Englanders trained in part-singing, who cheered or filled with courage the hearts of their fellow-soldiers with Billings' tunes.

This sort of music would be doubly welcome in view of the scarcity and scant equipment of military bands among the Americans, compared with the musical resources of the British soldiers.

This wilderness we chose our seat:
To right secured by equal laws.
From Persecution's iron claws
We here have sought our calm retreat.

Land where my fathers died
Land of the Pilgrims' pride,
From every mountain side
Let freedom ring.

ARTHUR FIEDLER TRYING OUT THE ANTHEM

POPS OPEN MAY 7

With Arthur Fiedler as their new conductor, the Pop Concerts in Symphony hall will begin at the expiration of the regular Symphony season. Wednesday, May 7, will be the opening night. This will be the 45th season of Boston's warm weather concerts, which have no counterpart in America. Arthur Fiedler will be the first native Bostonian to conduct the Pops. The son of Emanuel Fiedler, a violinist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra for many years and one of the original members of the Kneisel string quartet, Arthur Fiedler has likewise played in this orchestra for a number of seasons. He is known as a conductor of chamber music concerts, as the leader of the Cecilia Society Chorus, as pianist, and more particularly by the Esplanade concerts of last summer which he organized and conducted. Fiedler's programs at the Pops will include every type of music which is desired by the Pops public and suitable to a symphony orchestra.

According to Pops traditions, refreshments will be served in the course of the concerts at the tables which will cover the floor of Symphony Hall. The Pops will be given each night and on alternate Sundays through May and June.

The New England Generals, Benjamin Lincoln and Nathaniel Greene, were in operations all the way from New England to the Carolinas, Georgia and Virginia. Soldiers like to serve with leaders who are their heroes, so the plea: "No doubt the reader will excuse my not adapting words to all the tunes, as it is attended with great inconveniency."

Mr Appel explained that in the early days purchasers of music books were just as well satisfied as not to hunt up, or originate, words that could be adapted to a new tune.

A Clew to the Words

In one place it looked as if Billings had printed words for a hymn, and then forgotten to supply the music. A poem by Dr Byles was shown under the reading, "New England Hymn." No music by that title could be found that many New Englanders must have served with them the length of the country.

It has been pointed out by musicologists that many negro spirituals were garbled versions of Methodist hymns. Perhaps they were also inspired by Billings' tunes. At least, the spirituals make frequent use of "Hallelujas"—and Billings wrote several Halleluja choruses.

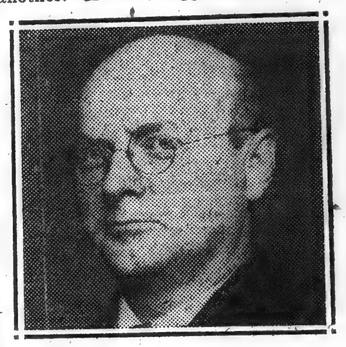
Rediscovery of "America"

How the American patriotic anthem, "America," was rediscovered by Arthur Fiedler is an interesting little story in itself.

Richard G. Appel, music librarian of the Boston Public Library and lecturer on the history of music in America at Boston University, invited the orchestra leader to look over some of the library's rare examples of the first music printed in America.

Some difficulty was encountered by the musician in following the old-fashioned, crudely engraved notation of Billings' "New England Psalm-Singer." He was also uncertain about some of the intended effects of the self-taught composer—who, by the way, is said by legend to have worked out his musical inspirations with chalk on pieces of leather in the tannery where he worked. Seeking enlightenment, Mr Fiedler began exploring quaint little parenthetical remarks and footnotes scattered by Billings here and there through his pages of music.

Billings was evidently a very impulsive fellow. He handled some problems of book-making one way, some another. Here he supplied words with his tunes, and elsewhere printed tunes without other word except a title.



RICHARD S. APPEL
Music librarian, Boston Public Library, who aided Mr Fiedler in the discovery of the American "America."

At the bottom of one page the orchestra leader found, in faint lettering, in the volume. Then Fiedler, faithful to his policy of tracking down all available explanatory matter, spied a note in small, faded print, between parentheses: "Adopted (sic) to America tune."

And, sure enough, one full page of music without words bore the barely legible title "America." It was arranged for four voices.

Softly the conductor began whistling the notes of one staff, as, piano-playing fashion, he drubbed on a library table to get the effect of the other three voices. Breaking off, he tried to fit the words to the notes, then halted and stared, puzzled. Mr Appel came to the rescue by offering the use of the piano in the lecture hall.

Experiment showed that the melody was carried by the alto voice, rather than the soprano or tenor, as would be

Continued on the Sixth Page

Use the Globe's Classified columns to Sell or Rent Real Estate. Read the Real Estate advts today.

Wonderful Self Control

Mrs Naggs—John, if I should die I don't believe you would know what to do.

Mr Naggs—Well, perhaps I wouldn't, but I hardly believe I would feel as good as that, Jane.—New Bedford Standard.

162 Trans

Music Is Motion

Apr 26

Arthur Fiedler Filmed as Conductor of The Pops

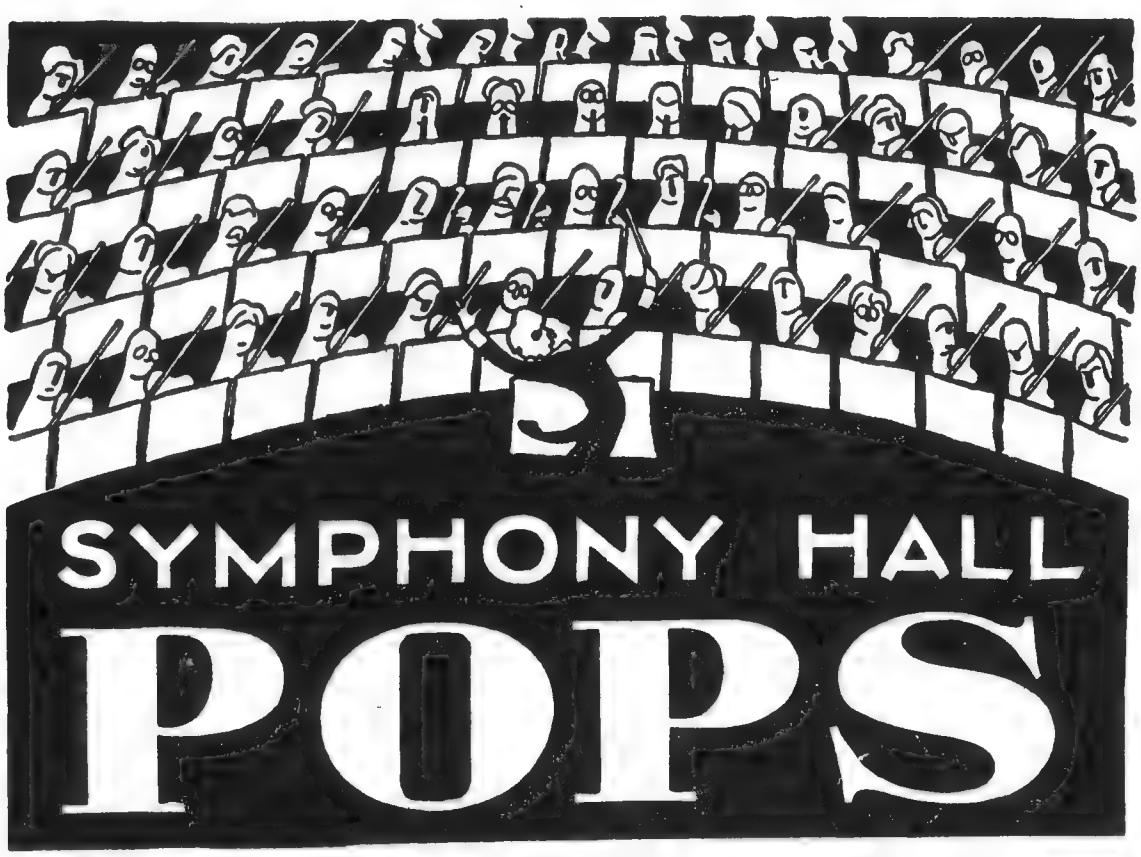
Bos. Sun. Herald

APR 27-1930

RLD OF MUSIC -:- -:- -:- By

(Photo by Boris)

Arthur Fiedler, who will conduct the "Pop" concerts at Sym phony hall this season, starting Wednesday evening, May 7.



85 SYMPHONY PLAYERS
ARTHUR FIEDLER, Conductor

TUESDAY, MAY 2

OPENING NIGHT

of the Fifty - Ninth Season

TABLE SEATS	$1.50
FIRST BALCONY	$1.50, $1.00, $0.60
SECOND BALCONY (unreserved)	$0.35

(Tax included)

EXHIBITS

1943–44

Oct. 8–9, 15–16, 22–23, 25–26, 29–30	Oils by W. Lester Stevens Serge Koussevitzky — Twentieth Anniversary Exhibition
Nov. 5–6, 12–13, 26–27	Paintings by George Kelly, Roland M. Newhall, Forrest W. Orr, and F. Wenderoth Saunders
Nov. 29–30, Dec. 3–4, 17–18	Six portraits by Boris Chaliapin, forming the Magnavox series of great contemporary musicians
Dec. 24–25, 27–28, 31–Jan. 1	Capehart Collection of paintings interpreting great musical compositions
Jan. 14–15, 21–22, 24–25, 28–29, Feb. 4–5	"Gelatone" Facsimiles of American paintings, original paintings, and etchings and lithographs by noted American artists — complete exhibit courtesy of Associated American Artists Galleries of New York City
Feb. 18–19, 25–26, 28–29	Paintings by eight members of the Guild of Boston Artists
Feb. 25–26, 28–29, Mar. 3–4	Wood carving by John Rood
Mar. 3–4	Photographs and sculpture by Esther Jackson
March 17–18, 24–25	Water colors by Sears Gallagher
April 6–8, 10–11, 14–15	Paintings by six Belmont Hill artists
April 21–22	Soviet Russian exhibition by the Council of American-Soviet Friendship
April 21–22, 28–29	Paintings by Agnes A. Abbot, Sally Cross Bill, and Polly Nordell

THE COPLEY PLAZA

Sunday Afternoon Cocktail Concert

4 to 6:30 p. m., every Sunday — a bright spot with audience participation.

ADMISSION $1.10 (85c IN CASH, 25c IN WAR STAMPS)
GRATUITIES AT YOUR OPTION — IN WAR SAVINGS STAMPS, PLEASE!

Custom made Furs

Style Beauty
Quality
Durability
Distinctiveness

W. V. SLOCUM INC.
Furriers Designers

657 Boylston Street, Boston
KENmore 1340-1

MISSING
PAGE(S)

Music and Musicians --- Plays and Players

Pops New Born, Signs, Wonders, And Surprises

Symphony Hall Transformed, New Conductor, Old Ways, Returned Public

THE WORLD may be feminized; but it is still possible to keep a secret where men are most concerned. Consider, for example, Ravel's "Bolero," played at Symphony Hall last evening for the beginning of a forty-fifth summer of Pops. A year and a half ago it went into rehearsal, as ballet, at the Opéra in Paris. The orchestra had not "run it" half "through" before everyone within earshot perceived that it would make no small sensation. Yet somehow the secret was kept—and with a woman leader in the deed—until the first public performance. Thereafter a stirred audience "told the world" and enough of us in America, when Mr. Toscanini and Dr. Koussevitzky produced the piece, knew what to expect.

Or consider the surroundings in which, last evening, Mr. Arthur Fiedler and the orchestra played "Bolero." In our time (as the editorial writers like to say) Symphony Hall has not undergone such change of aspect. Since the end of the Symphony Concerts last Saturday, the making of it was a day-and-night job, finished barely two hours before the first audience began to assemble. Yet not a word oozed out of Symphony Hall nor did "the sleuth-hounds of journalism" pick up the scent until word came to them—with next to no particulars—to despatch photographers, one of whose work appears in neighboring columns on this page.

When Mr. Fiedler was chosen for conductor, a general refitting of The Pops was evidently in prospect. The authorities resolved to extend it to the concert-room. It is their good custom to seek able and sympathetic ability for whatever may be in hand. Accordingly, they asked Mr. Robert Edmond Jones—first, in both senses of the word, of American designers for the theater—to undertake the summer redecoration of Symphony Hall. His work once more praises him. (He was present last evening and must have caught many an echo of the general surprise and approval.) A theater seen in Venice suggested the general scheme to Mr. Jones. To some that scanned the outcome, it also recalled the Redoutensaal in the Hapsburg Palace at Vienna, say with a touch of Schönbrünn, as summer-villa, added. Anyhow in it was hint of the eighteenth century before rococo came, as there must be to suit with the lines, the spacing, the decoration, of the original design by the illustrious McKim.

As it is, to right, left and behind the orchestra runs a deep wainscot of green and gold lattice-work. Above it, by a distribution of soft-colored globes among the usual electric lamps, the familiar grayish panelling takes on a lighter hue. The platforms upon which the players sit, the conductor's stand, the chairs and the music-racks are painted to harmonize with this gray, relieved here and there, where the eye quickly meets it, by arabesques in pale gold. Above the center of the stage hangs a many branched and globed chandelier, around it are sparse and slender brackets, both of distinctly eighteenth-century design.

Finally, to right and left of the proscenium arch are curtains drawn back and looped; while a lambrequin of the same fabric hangs horizontally above them. Precisely of what color this nameless fabric is bids fair to become a subject of pleasing controversy among frequenters of The Pops. Certainly it is crossed and relieved by pale gold arabesques. The authorities at Symphony Hall affirmed that the basic color was gray. Yet under the lights it seemed to the casual eye a tawny brown. Which divergence of fact and impression left most in the confusion besetting Hamlet and Polonius in the play, as they speak of camels, whales and such like.

For the auditorium, around each entrance-door to the floor and the tables runs a frame of the green and gold lattice; while the warm winter red of the walls is now painted a cool summer grey. This grey, with spaciousness and "coolth" in its train—there was need of both in the reeking heat of last evening—continues to the top of the auditorium. From the chandeliers descends the gently decanted light already noted. The chairs at the tables repeat the golden tint. (How much will not a little gilding do!). The tables themselves are painted in pale green with pale gold arabesques. . . . So in Symphony Hall is divested of winter aspect; wears now green and gold and grey befitting oncoming spring and bourgeoning summer; suggests a chaste and elegant haunt of light pleasure, (as my Lord Chesterfield or even Dr. Johnson, might have written); for a warm-weather concert-room, is unique in America, and, may be, overseas.

From top to bottom, the first audience filled floor and balconies, everywhere suggesting new-born interest in the reborn Pops. To see, it was rather more modish than it has run of recent years. Dinner coats and evening gowns were as plentiful as the jackets and skirts of the daily round; while the student of feminine apparel—spring 1930—might observe that the fine-meshed, full-brimmed straw hat has come back—definitely and becomingly. It was to be noted also that Boston—to no small credit—remains an obstinate community against the return of the toe-touching skirt, even for evening wear. The evidence of one's eyes was proof at Symphony Hall, as it was last winter at the Opera House. A connoisseur, who makes his living in such things, confirmed the ocular impression. And out of the Middle West, where it is almost rule and habit, we are borrowing white flannel trousers under a dark jacket as semi-formal summer dress for youth and youngish men.

Less the mode than the new conductor engrossed the audience. It greeted Mr. Fiedler long and loud. It applauded him heartily—and discriminatingly—after every piece and performance. Plainly, it liked his alert, business-like procedures; his swift readiness with extra numbers the moment the clapping warranted them. It took pleasure as well in his youth, agreeable aspect, pleasing manners, flowing and exuberant energy. And before a company in which young women are many, it is no detriment—in this gossiping town—to be an eligible bachelor, not without that quality which it is movie-custom to denote by initials or else by the neuter pronoun. For the first time, moreover, a son of the Symphony Orchestra had risen, by sheer ability, to be conductor of its Pops.

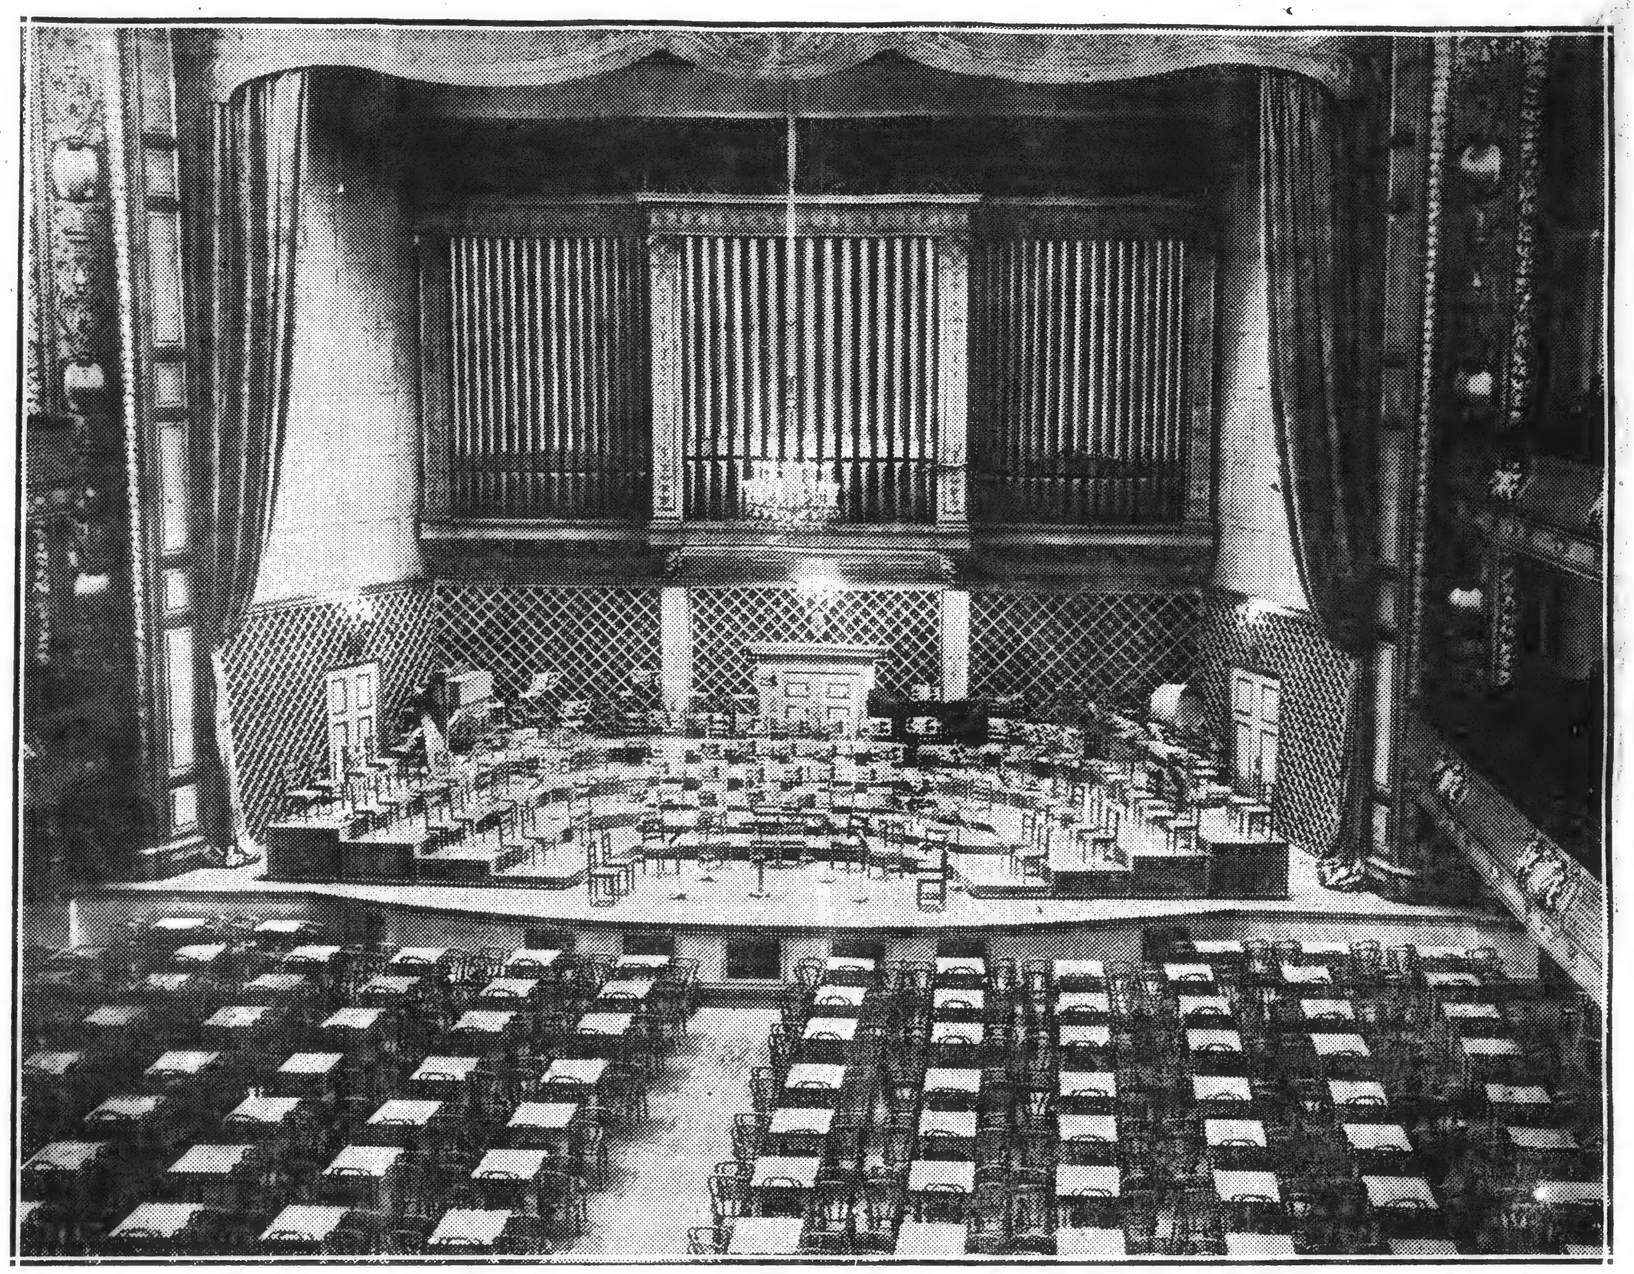
As such, Mr. Fiedler's unflagging energy and quick versatility were most in evidence. He likes sonorities and did not spare them in the pageant and ensemble music from "Aida." Yet his hand was light and flexible upon the changeful overture to "Mignon." His sense of color and contrast ran clear in Kreisler's "Tambourin Chinois." He beat out the implacable tune, the relentless rhythm, the unrelaxing crescendo, the final burst of modulation in Ravel's "Bolero." (Tempo of Koussevitzky, not Toscanini.) He felt and conveyed the sensuous rhythm, the sensuous Straussian strings, of the waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier." He "put over" a potpourri from Mr. Romberg's "New Moon" as though the musical plays were his conducting trade. In fact, with two exceptions, and for no small merit, he "put over" every piece, "extras" included. One exception was the "Rhine Journey" of Siegfried—by no means Wagner incandescent in the concert-hall; the less for lack of propulsive force in Mr. Fedler's version. The other, and minor, was the familiar "Moment Musical" of Schubert, which he might have taken with lighter touch and finer-spun melody. . . . And from beginning to end the orchestra — Mr. Theodorowicz again in the concert-master's chair—worked for and with him.

Throughout, again, there was no mistaking the satisfaction of the audience in the return to the long-standing type of Pop program, with lighter and easier-going numbers to the fore. Those who would have The Pops symphony concerts in miniature and at modest prices, enjoyed an inning three seasons long with the departed Casella. They may or may not be a majority of the habitués; certainly they are an insufficiently sustaining public. By the signs of last evening, the casual, idling, trifling audience has returned in numbers, prepared to stay if within reason, and by no means selfishly, it is humored.

After all, it is a good rule of life to play about as much as possible—particularly in the concert-hall—from May to October. Seven or eight months of "due diligence" are quite enough, in human infirmity, for most of us. Slip in the two Richards, Wagner and Strauss; Chaikovsky and Rimsky; Ravel and Debussy, Weber, Mendelssohn, Beethoven even, as Mr. Fiedler intends to do. But let us also hear the sighing or the jigging tunes, not yet quite threadbare, of "Mignon"; Kern and Kálmán and Herbert of the musical plays; Krének fondly fancying he is writing American jazz and Gershwin actually glorifying it. Not too often gladiators may march or flowers whisper. . . . The more, the merrier.

H. T. P.

"When Visitors Are Coming to Town—



—It Is the Time to Put One's Best Foot Forward" (Transcript Photograph by Frank Colby)

Stage and Foreground of Symphony Hall as Newly Decorated by Robert Edmond Jones for The Pops of 1930

At The Pops Tonight

Evening of The Women's City Club

Rakoczy March ..... Berlioz
Overture to The Opera, "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Lullaby from The Ballet, "The Fire-Bird" ..... Stravinsky
Rhapsody, "España" ..... Chabrier
Prelude to The Opera, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ..... Wagner
Valse Triste ..... Sibelius
Tone-Poem, "Pines of Rome" ..... Respighi
Selection from The Opera, "Jonny spielt auf" ..... Krenek
(Shimmy, Jazz, Spiritual, Blues)
Waltz, "Girls of Baden" ..... Komzák
Slavic March ..... Chaikovsky

Conductor: A. Fiedler

At the play was in sight. The talkies were in the full flash of menace, and it was supposed by some that their ability to undercut the flesh-and-blood drama in price and outrival it in luxury of housing would bring the curtain down with permanent effect in the old-fashioned theatre. Subsequent events have shown only that the film public has moved on to the new mode, while the play public has been rather better than constant.

It is curious how little the two overlap. On the night when the talkie of "Journey's End" was launched upon London with much pomp and clamor the bookings for the play went up, although it had already run for fifteen months. A musical comedy named "Rio Rita" was produced as a film with all accoutrements of song, dance and spectacle. Yet, later on, the same piece was chosen to open a big theater in London, as though it were in no way a revival or a second-best. As far as London is concerned, new theaters rise as rapidly as new picture houses, although the latter have an immense financial advantage in the capital, since they are permitted, with preposterous lack of logic, to entertain the huge crowds who can find nothing better to do with Sunday evenings. Even Good Friday is not barred to them. One big London film-house was plastered with notices announcing " 'The Flame of Love' —special Good Friday performances." Yet the theater continues. The fountains, replete with goldfish here or ice-cream there, which are the triumph of " a motion-picture cathedral de luxe" have not washed drama away.

The touring system has shown signs of stress, but the revival of the local stock

168

Lovers of Music—Not Too Classical—Made Happy

OPENING OF POPS CONCERT

Judging From the Enthusiastic Reception Accorded Last Evening to Arthur Fiedler at the "Pops" Première at Symphony Hall, in Which Both the Audience and Members of the Orchestra Heartily Joined, It Would Seem That the Gifted Conductor Has Hit the Taste of Boston's Spring Concert-Goers. This Does Not Mean That the Classical Is Ignored Under the New Baton but That It Is Pleasantly Relieved by Tunes of the Lighter Sort—in Fact, Even Jazz, Good Jazz, Has a Place in the Varied Repertory Mr. Fiedler Offers. Decorations by Robert Edmond Jones Make a Pleasing Frame for a Pleasing Entertainment.

ander, it was imperative to reinstate

Pop Concert, in Bright New Dress, Delights Big First Night Audience

(Continued from Page 1)

dictatorship, it seems certain, is to restore the Pop concerts to their old popularity. The Pops have always been attractive to Bostonians and to visitors. They achieved their greatest success in the years immediately following prohibition, which brought a marked increase in attendance. In the last few years they have experienced a slight slump, caused apparently by a conductorial tendency to turn them into symphonic rites at which audiences were expected to listen in awesome silence to the "serious" music charactesistic of regular symphony programs.

It is Mr. Fiedler's task to restore to the Pops their original nature, that of an agreeable entertainment at which one may hear light and tuneful music, expertly played, and yet speak to one's neighbor, sip a cold drink and even perhaps drop a spoon without fear of being expelled from the hall.

If last night's experience is any criterion, there can be no doubt that the good old-new ways have been successfully restored, to the satisfaction of everybody. The applause which greeted Mr. Fiedler was renewed after every number, indicating that his ideas of program-making were those of his hearers. A thorough musician and an able conductor, he is closely enough in touch with the taste of the great public to understand their requirements. Without sacrifice of musical standards, he is able to contrive programs which contain plenty of tunes and plenty of lilting rhythms. This is what Pops audiences want, and it is what they are entitled to have.

Last night's program contained the Overture to Thomas's "Mignon," Waltzes from "Rosenkavalier," the "Aïda" Fantasia, Siegfried's Rhine Journey, Kreisler's "Tambourin Chinois," Ravel's "Bolero," selections from "The New Moon," Blon's "Whispering of the Flowers" and Herbert's "American Fantasy." An admirably contrasted list, with gestures toward classical music and with good measure of popular numbers. The "Bolero" instantly captured the Pop audience, as it had the symphony audiences of last winter.

Programs to come hold equal interest. Tonight, for example, you may hear not only old favorites like Chabrier's "España" and Tchaikovsky's "Marche Slave," but the Berceuse from Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird" and Respighi's "Pines of Rome," with its famous nightingale. Nor is jazz to be barred. Tonight's program contains also selections from Křenek's jazz opera, "Jonny Spielt Auf," which in the last two years has been performed in every opera house and has made its composer a fortune.

Decidedly, the Pops have come back.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL RETURNS TO AYRSHIRE

SPECIAL TO THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

GIRVAN, Scotland—Sir Charles Fergusson Bt., of Kilkerran, Ayrshire,

SUNSHINE AND SALT AIR—

Now that the first-night frenzy of the idolaters has subsided it is possible to view with calm detachment the impression made by Mr. Arthur Fiedler as new conductor of the Pops concert in Symphony hall. Not since the days of Gustav Struber and the old Music hall (now the Orpheum Theatre), has a Pops band had such an amiable leader, or one who realized so unmistakably that this is summer and that symphonic concerts should end in the late spring. Mr. Fiedler's most potent asset, it would seem, is his ability to make programs befitting the season. For many lean years Pops patrons have hungered for the best in light music, semi-classical or conservatively modernistic. Mr. Fiedler, judging by scrutiny of his programs of the past and the coming week, will do his best to appease that hunger. This is as it should be. The Pops are a beloved institution, to be enjoyed by all who seek to combine friendly sociability and music from 80 finished instrumentalists through a restful evening. With Mr. Fiedler to lead the way, and with the wonderfully cheery color changes in Symphony hall, this should prove an epochal season.

Herald May 11

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
MAY 11 1930

Arthur Fiedler, Now Conducting Boston Symphony "Pops."

"POPS" TOO POPULAR

To the Editor of The Herald:

This year's Pops concerts have opened as a great disappointment to myself as well as many others. Since when has it become necessary for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is rated as one of the best in the world, to stoop to jazz in order to draw an audience out of the city reputed to be the centre of culture? Mr. Fiedler is showing remarkably poor judgment and taste by including such numbers as "The Stein Song," "Strike Up the Band," etc. They are dinned into our ears from all sides, and Symphony hall is the last place on earth where they should be played. I like jazz and can have as good a time as the next man at a dance. However, I believe that a line should be drawn between that and the classic. Each one in its place.

Mr. Fiedler is deceiving himself when he classes the applause he receives after these numbers with that which follows the old masters' works. Fools are delighted and amused at the ridiculous novelty of hearing the Symphony orchestra play syncopated tunes. Novelties wear out, and so will Mr. Fiedler's artificial popularity. For any one man to display so great a lack of a sense of proportion as to follow the "Stein Song" with "March Slave" and others of that calibre, is incredible. Jazz is written for the dance and not to listen to. Perhaps Mr. Fiedler would consider clearing the centre of the floor for dancing. It is just as reasonable to do that as to play that sort of thing for his audience.

LOUIS APPLEBAUM.

Waverley, May 13.

Herald May 17

168

Lovers of Music—Not Too Classical—Made Happy

OPENING OF POPS CONCERT

Judging From the Enthusiastic Reception Accorded Last Evening to Arthur Fiedler at the "Pops" Première at Symphony Hall, in Which Both the Audience and Members of the Orchestra Heartily Joined, It Would Seem That the Gifted Conductor Has Hit the Taste of Boston's Spring Concert-Goers. This Does Not Mean That the Classical Is Ignored Under the New Baton but That It Is Pleasantly Relieved by Tunes of the Lighter Sort—in Fact, Even Jazz, Good Jazz, Has a Place in the Varied Repertory Mr. Fiedler Offers. Decorations by Robert Edmond Jones Make a Pleasing Frame for a Pleasing Entertainment.

ander, it was imperative to reinstate

Pop Concert, in Bright New Dress, Delights Big First Night Audience

(Continued from Page 1)

dictatorship, it seems certain, is to restore the Pop concerts to their old popularity. The Pops have always been attractive to Bostonians and to visitors. They achieved their greatest success in the years immediately following prohibition, which brought a marked increase in attendance. In the last few years they have experienced a slight slump, caused apparently by a conductorial tendency to turn them into symphonic rites at which audiences were expected to listen in awesome silence to the "serious" music charactesistic of regular symphony programs.

It is Mr. Fiedler's task to restore to the Pops their original nature, that of an agreeable entertainment at which one may hear light and tuneful music, expertly played, and yet speak to one's neighbor, sip a cold drink and even perhaps drop a spoon without fear of being expelled from the hall.

If last night's experience is any criterion, there can be no doubt that the good old-new ways have been successfully restored, to the satisfaction of everybody. The applause which greeted Mr. Fiedler was renewed after every number, indicating that his ideas of program-making were those of his hearers. A thorough musician and an able conductor, he is closely enough in touch with the taste of the great public to understand their requirements. Without sacrifice of musical standards, he is able to contrive programs which contain plenty of tunes and plenty of lilting rhythms. This is what Pops audiences want, and it is what they are entitled to have.

Last night's program contained the Overture to Thomas's "Mignon," Waltzes from "Rosenkavalier," the "Aïda" Fantasia, Siegfried's Rhine Journey, Kreisler's "Tambourin Chinois," Ravel's "Bolero," selections from "The New Moon," Blon's "Whispering of the Flowers" and Herbert's "American Fantasy." An admirably contrasted list, with gestures toward classical music and with good measure of popular numbers. The "Bolero" instantly captured the Pop audience, as it had the symphony audiences of last winter.

Programs to come hold equal interest. Tonight, for example, you may hear not only old favorites like Chabrier's "España" and Tchaikovsky's "Marche Slave," but the Berceuse from Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird" and Respighi's "Pines of Rome," with its famous nightingale. Nor is jazz to be barred. Tonight's program contains also selections from Křenek's jazz opera, "Jonny Spielt Auf," which in the last two years has been performed in every opera house and has made its composer a fortune.

Decidedly, the Pops have come back.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL RETURNS TO AYRSHIRE

SPECIAL TO THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

GIRVAN, Scotland—Sir Charles Fergusson Bt., of Kilkerran, Ayrshire,

SUNSHINE AND SALT AIR—

Now that the first-night frenzy of the idolaters has subsided it is possible to view with calm detachment the impression made by Mr. Arthur Fiedler as new conductor of the Pops concert in Symphony hall. Not since the days of Gustav Struber and the old Music hall (now the Orpheum Theatre), has a Pops band had such an amiable leader, or one who realized so unmistakably that this is summer and that symphonic concerts should end in the late spring. Mr. Fiedler's most potent asset, it would seem, is his ability to make programs befitting the season. For many lean years Pops patrons have hungered for the best in light music, semi-classical or conservatively modernistic. Mr. Fiedler, judging by scrutiny of his programs of the past and the coming week, will do his best to appease that hunger. This is as it should be. The Pops are a beloved institution, to be enjoyed by all who seek to combine friendly sociability and music from 30 finished instrumentalists through a restful evening. With Mr. Fiedler to lead the way, and with the wonderfully cheery color changes in Symphony hall, this should prove an epochal season.

Herald May 11

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
MAY 11 1930

Arthur Fiedler, Now Conducting Boston Symphony "Pops."

"POPS" TOO POPULAR

To the Editor of The Herald:

This year's Pops concerts have opened as a great disappointment to myself as well as many others. Since when has it become necessary for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is rated as one of the best in the world, to stoop to jazz in order to draw an audience out of the city reputed to be the centre of culture? Mr. Fiedler is showing remarkably poor judgment and taste by including such numbers as "The Stein Song," "Strike Up the Band," etc. They are dinned into our ears from all sides, and Symphony hall is the last place on earth where they should be played. I like jazz and can have as good a time as the next man at a dance. However, I believe that a line should be drawn between that and the classic. Each one in its place.

Mr. Fiedler is deceiving himself when he classes the applause he receives after these numbers with that which follows the old masters' works. Fools are delighted and amused at the ridiculous novelty of hearing the Symphony orchestra play syncopated tunes. Novelties wear out, and so will Mr. Fiedler's artificial popularity. For any one man to display so great a lack of a sense of proportion as to follow the "Stein Song" with "March Slave" and others of that calibre, is incredible. Jazz is written for the dance and not to listen to. Perhaps Mr. Fiedler would consider clearing the centre of the floor for dancing. It is just as reasonable to do that as to play that sort of thing for his audience.

LOUIS APPLEBAUM.

Waverley, May 13.

Herald May 17

Concert-Chronicle

May 14

"Skyscrapers" and Mr. Fiedler

A CONDUCTOR could hardly be in more fortunate position than Arthur Fiedler at The Pops. His orchestra likes and respects him; will also work for him. Though the "regular season" is ended at Symphony Hall, it does not demur to three hours of rehearsal when an exacting piece is to be added to the repertory. Once in the concert-room, it adds good will to due diligence; gives back warm and flowing tone, spirited rhythm, a pervading precision and alertness that more than one of Mr. Fiedler's predecessors was unable to command. The audience is as friendly and good-tempered. It likes the range of the programs; is expectant of the "extras"; welcomes the freedom from every musical snobbishness. If a novel piece is in hand, it listens curious and well-disposed.

For the first time, yesterday, Mr. Carpenter's ballet, "Skyscrapers," was played "in concert form" at The Pops. An unaccustomed audience found it a little lengthy, say in the Coney-Island section, but applauded it as heartily as could be expected at first acquaintance. It may hardly have believed its ears when it heard three-quarters of the Symphony Orchestra playing "sweet jazz" and playing it uncommonly well. "A ballet of American life" said the program—evidently a "high-brow" ballet, yet pounding or snapping out discords when Americans were at work, falling into popular idioms when they were at play, quite as though the composer were to the manner born. Indeed he is—this Mr. Carpenter of Chicago, writing for the Metropolitan Opera House and symphony concerts. After Carpenter, Bartók—in six brief Roumanian Dances, so short that the end surprised many, yet not lacking the harsh rhythms, the pungent melodies, the strident or languorous voice he is wont to find in mid-European folk-music. Two modernists on one program. Evidently Mr. Fiedler believes that we listeners like to live in our own time.

Freshly heard and idiomatically played, "Skyscrapers" renewed every impression that sets the ballet high in American music and high among Mr. Carpenter's "works." The beginning, rough-coated with dissonance, piercing and hammering at the ear, is the sound of daily work translated into tones. Nervously and with a din up go our towers of steel and stone. After the day's work, the night's play. To it in crowds; to it with excitement. Thousands of feet shall beat out the syncopated rhythms. Thousands of voices sing the jazzy tunes, half-gay, half-smeary. The sentimental mood deepens and the Spiritual, or something next of kin, sounds. The sportive mood returns; jazz it up. . . . Somewhere in the distance the skyscrapers are looming through the shining night. Soon it will be morning and work again. Mr. Carpenter readily finds his final "apotheosis," as the journeymen of the old ballet called it; finds and also poetizes. American rhythms,

Concert Chronicle

Cecilia at the Pops

Trans May 15

THE "Pops," like their winter brethren, the Symphony Concerts, have their novelties. But let these have the qualities which quickly catch the popular imagination, and they soon cease to be novelties and are added to the regular Pops repertory. Thus not so many years ago the presence of music by Ravel on a Pops program would have been matter for special comment. The presence of his "La Valse" there now leads only to the comment that it has come to take its place side by side with

"L'Arlesienne," the "Flight of the Bumble Bee," the meditation from "Thais" admirably played last evening by Mr. Theodorowicz), and Sousa's march, "Stars and Stripes Forever." Further is it worth noting that its performance was greeted with such volume of applause as to cause Mr. Fiedler bid his men rise to their feet in acknowledgment.

Last evening too had its novelties; novelties which could easily win place in the repertory did they not call for too great an amount of assistance from outside the orchestra. This assistance requires nothing less than a full chorus—provided last evening by the Cecilia Society of which Mr. Fiedler is also the conductor. The reference is to the presence on this program of the "Coronation Scene" from Musorgsky's opera "Boris Godunov," of Henschel's "Morning Hymn," of the Polovtsian Dances out of Borodin's opera "Prince Igor." That these gave pleasure there can be no doubt. For the "Cecilia" was in fine form and Mr. Fiedler conducted with an excellent blending of skill and imagination. Musorgsky's gorgeous music wanted only its pictorial setting to complete its gorgeousness; the chorus provided its portion, the orchestra exceeded that sometimes provided by opera orchestras, Mr. Harry Newcombe sang persuasively the solo passages. And Mr. Fiedler read the score in manner to provide no little thrill. Henschel's "Morning Hymn" sounded as fresh, in its sustained mood, as the day it was first heard. But a final "punch" in an excellent program came from the barbaric dances from "Prince Igor." If memory slips not, it was Dr. Koussevitzky who first brought them to the Symphony Concerts in their choral form. Mr. Monteux has played them as purely orchestral pieces. Thus new are they to the repertory of the orchestra. And now they come to the "Pops." Could the "Cecilia" be a sort of auxiliary chorus to the "Pops" they would keep their place in its repertory. Mr. Fiedler gave to these dances that virility, more, that barbaric energy which is the making of them. From tempo to increased tempo the activity grew wilder. Frenzy followed frenzy in this music. It is putting it mildly to say that the young conductor was masterly in the reading of this score, that chorus and orchestra gave him all he required of them. A. H. M.

Incidents and Prospects

The schedule for next week at The Pops includes the first Sunday concert and the annual "Harvard Night." On Sunday Chaikovsky and lesser Russians will divide the program. Nothing longer than a single symphonic movement will be played. "Harvard Night" falls on Monday, with the Glee Club assisting in eight light numbers, four of which are folk-songs.

Other incidents of the week are a repetition of "Bolero" on Tuesday and of the jazz potpourri from "Jonny spielt auf" on Wednesday. Ferdy Grofe's "Mississippi Suite"—jazz-rhythms and jazzy sentiment astutely blended—is listed for next Thursday; Casella's familiar "Italia" returns on Saturday. On the same evening Prokofiev comes for the first time into The Pops with the second movement of his "Scythian Suite"—the Dance of Black Spirits.

Bax's Second Symphony, confided by the composer to Dr. Koussevitzky for production last winter in Boston and New York, will be played in London next Tuesday. Mr. Goossens will conduct and for the first time the composer will hear his music. American praise has whetted English expectation.

Concert-Chronicle

Trans May 16

Sartorial Suggestion

FROM a correspondent signing herself (or himself) G. C. comes a pleasing fancy submitted herewith to the management of Symphony Hall:

"I have been thinking since The Pops reopened that the rather baroque stage decorations of Symphony Hall call for something more glamorous than formal dress on the members of the orchestra. Why not powdered wigs and court dress? How appropriate these costumes would be, for example, to the "Rosenkavalier" waltzes!

But hardly, if this department may take its turn at suggestion, to the jazz of "Jonny spielt auf" or the melodious haulage of the Volga Bargemen. And fancy a whitened wig upon the raven locks, tossing and confused, of Mr. Fiedler! "No, a thousand times, no!" says the young person who is taking this dictation.

End and Accomplishment

THIS CLIPPING FROM QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER
MAY 17 1930

The Pops at Symphony hall, Boston, though 45 years old, were never younger. Indeed, they have taken a new lease on life and have for their new conductor, Arthur Fiedler, who has in recent seasons attracted a great deal of attention by his obvious and rising talent. Known as the conductor of chamber concerts, of the Esplanade concerts last summer, of the Cecilia Society chorus, as pianist and viola player of the Boston Symphony orchestra, he will be the first Boston conductor of the Pops. Many clubs and organizations engage groups of seats together, and arrange for bus parties from distant points to visit the Pops. Arthur Fiedler's programs are designed to appeal to every element of the Pops' audiences which perhaps are as mixed as any musical public. Programs for the coming week:

Sunday night a Russian-Tschaikowsky program and Monday, "Harvard Night" Orchestra, and Harvard Glee club, will give a varied program.

TUESDAY MAY 20

March, "El Capitan".....Sousa
Overture, "A Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn
Liebesfreud.....Kreisler
Fantasia, "Tosca".....Puccini
Animals' Carnival, Zoological Fantasy.....Saint-Saens
Ave Maria.....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Bolero.....Ravel
Waltz, "Sleeping Beauty"..Tschaikowsky
Dubinushka, Folk Song.....Arranged by Jacchia
Selection, "New Moon".....Romberg

WEDNESDAY, OPERATIC.

Polonaise, "Eugen Onegin"..Tschaikowsky
Overture, "The Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
Song of India, from "Sadko".....Rimsky-Korsakov
Fantasia, "Aida".....Verdi
Prelude and Love Death, "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
Duet, "Hansel and Gretel"..Humperdinck
Introduction to Act 3, "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Selection from "Jonny Spielt Auf".....Krenek
Intermezzo, "Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini

THURSDAY

March, "High School Cadets".....Sousa
Overture, "The Flying Dutchman".....Wagner
Minuet.....Bolzoni
Espana, Rhapsody.....Chabrier
Mississippi Suite.....Grofe
Ave Maria.....Bach-Gounod
Overture Solennelle, "1812" Tschaikowsky
Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner
Dream Melody, "Naughty Marietta".....Herbert
Procession of the Boyards.....Halvorsen

FRIDAY

March, Second Connecticut Regiment.....Reeves
Minuet.....Boccherini
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah".....Saint-Saens
Spanish Suite, "La Feria".....Lacome
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Marche Slave.....Tschaikowsky
Selection, "The Fortune Teller"...Herbert
Waltz, "Blue Danube".....Strauss
American Patrol.....Meacham

SATURDAY

March, "Maple Leaf".....Laurandeau
Overture to "Orpheus".....Offenbach
Valse Triste.....Sibelius
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore".....Verdi
Scythian Suite, Second Movement.....Prokofieff
Largo.....Handel
(Solo violin: Julius Theodorowicz, Harp, Organ Strings)
Italia, Rhapsody.....Casella
Selection, "Show Boat".....Kern
Waltz, "Girls of Baden".....Komzak
Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar

Music Notes

May 15 Globe

Events at the Pops this week include the first of the fortnightly Sunday evening programs tonight, devoted to Russian music; the annual Harvard night with numbers by the Harvard Glee Club tomorrow night, an operatic program, including a duet from "Hansel and Gretel" to be sung by Jeska Schwartz Morse and Bernice Fisher Butler, Wednesday night, and the usual array of light music, old and new, on the other nights. The hour of beginning has been shifted from 8:15 to 8:30.

THE BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—MAY 18, 1930

AUDIENCES MORE ATTENTIVE NOW

Fiedler, Conductor of the "Pops," Says People Will Always Appreciate Good Music

"Audiences are much more attentive to music today than were those of past years," says Arthur Fiedler, who is now conducting his first season of the "Pops" concerts. "There may be some slight difficulty in getting started at the beginning of a concert, but as soon as the music begins there is almost immediate quiet."

Mr Fiedler has brought back to the "Pops" the operatic fantasias. Listeners will be able to hear representative works of ultra-modern composers.

Examples of good "symphonic" jazz, will be given, such as Gershwin's doubly famous "Rhapsody in Blue" and the later "An American in Paris." Grofe's (pronounced Grow-fay's) "Mississippi Suite" also will be played.

ARTHUR FIEDLER

The new conductor's manner is brisk and impresses one as being the outlet of a large store of energy. He smiles warmly. Collar open at throat, hair tousled, face damp from exertions of rehearsal, Mr Fiedler spoke between puffs on a much enjoyed cigarette. His manner of speaking is quiet yet precise.

Jazz to Disappear

He was talking about future music of the United States, whether there would evolve a music of a distinctly national character other than jazz, and what sort of music would it be?

"I think its characteristics will be the musical utterance of many phases of the mechanistic life of large, modern, American cities. Certain details of the life of the large centers have penetrated to no small extent into the provincial sections and the obscure corners of our country. The widespread distribution and use of modern mass-produced material goods has contributed to the quickening of the national pulse and thus will have an effect upon the musical impulses of all parts of the Nation, as such distribution and use constitutes a common bond of interest between the differing temperaments of North, South, East, and West."

Jazz of the African and Negroid types will, he believes, ultimately disappear. Fiedler regards Honegger, a Frenchman, and Prokofieff, a Russian, although not of this country, to have expressed uncommonly well, in such works as "Pacific 231" and the ballet "Pas D'Acier" ("Steps of Steel" is a literal translation), the mechanistic propensities of turbulent modern American life. He thinks the methods which these composers have used in writing their music and the general spirit of their music will be drawn upon in the native American music of the future. Other compositions which he regards as having helped to point the way are Ernest Bloch's "American Rhapsody," and Frederick S. Converse's "Flivver Ten Million."

First Appearance in Berlin

Mr Fiedler, eminent as violinist, pianist, and player of the viola and celesta, was born here in 1894 and obtained his early education in this city. His first musical training came from his father, Emanuel Fiedler, for 25 years a first violin of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a member of the original Franz Kneisel Quartet.

In Arthur's early 'teens, the elder Fielder retired from the Symphony and the family went to Vienna. Thence, after a short time they moved to Berlin in order that Arthur could attend the Royal Academy of Music there. At that time Arthur was 15 and one of the youngest students enrolled in the academy. His first public appearance was made as a conductor in Berlin when he was 17.

He joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra as viola in 1915 and for a long time was its youngest player. About six years ago Mr Fiedler founded the "Boston Sinfonietta," a small orchestra of about 20 Symphony men. The "Sinfonietta," with Mr Fiedler conducting, has done much modern music written in the smaller forms.

He also is the conductor of the Cecilia Society Chorus. The open-air concerts given on the Charles River Esplanade last Summer were organized and conducted by Mr Fiedler. He is a bachelor.

Grand Opera's Future

During the past few months there has been much splattering of ink concerning the present state and the future of grand opera. Mr Fiedler, asked to give his opinion regarding the presentation of grand opera to modern audiences, answered, with great emphasis, that although the radio exerts a strong influence and reaches a tremendous and otherwise inacessible audience, personal appearances of musical bands never would be entirely displaced by mechanically reproduced music.

He believes that while radio, or opera in the "talkies," may serve to acquaint many people with music hitherto unfamiliar, both devices undoubtedly will whet the appetites of many listeners to hear such music performed by real, live artists.

"I think that with the assistance of people of wealth there are sufficient financial resources in this country to carry on opera permanently. Whereas the metropolitan and Provincial operas of European countries are backed by Government subsidy, opera in America should be assisted by persons of wealth, independent of official position. I don't care what you say, in spite of the radio, there will always be a desire to hear—in the flesh—the two main branches of music, the symphonic orchestra and the opera."

No Reason for Fear

Black—I wonder why a dog puts such an implicit trust in a man?

White—Well, you never heard of a man trying to borrow money off a dog after selling him a used car.—Stray Stories.

tone."

May 17 Globe

The physics laboratory opens new methods of investigation of the beauty of music, according to the dean, who said the reduction of music into its mechanical components makes it possible to penetrate musical secrets which defy ordinary analysis.

"There are scores of ways," he said, "in which we can create beauty by deviation from true pitch, constant intensity and so on. When it can be shown that deviation from pitch in a particular way is beautiful it will be recognized as a principle in art."

Samuel Chotzinoff, in the New York World, recently published the following "musical caricature" of Dr Koussevitzky:

"The Boston Symphony was once the wonder of the world. At the end of the late war it was listed in the class of the maimed and wounded. Frenchmen were imported to cure it, but their ministrations proved to be the medicine of diplomacy. The directors decided to try something Russian and engaged Mr Serge Koussevitzky. Mr Koussevitzky was celebrated as a phenomenal virtuoso on the double bass who, having acquired wealth, assembled an orchestra, chartered a boat and sailed the Volga, bringing symphonic culture to the unlettered inhabitants of the banks of this famous stream. Mr Koussevitzky arrived in Boston, captured the allegiance of the town without a struggle and, coming to Carnegie Hall, was greeted by the public and the press as the resuscitator of the comatose Bostonians.

"And now again, as in pre-war days, the Boston Orchestra fills Carnegie Hall. Dr Koussevitzky has turned the trick—and knows it. There is a unanimous rattle of applause as the elegant doctor makes his appearance, a tribute which has time to grow into a demonstration while he walks leisurely to his platform. He is sleek, and his form is tailored to perfection. He walks like a general who, after having achieved a colossal victory, is prevailed upon to exhibit himself to his grateful countrymen. He knows the psychology that actuates mobs; he also knows his own worth. Before mounting his stand he faces the adoring multitude and remains immovable as if waiting for the applause to rise to proportions sufficiently magnificent to merit his acknowledgment. The thunder having grown large, the doctor lifts his head to the gallery and draws an arc by lowering it (the head) to the first row of the orchestra, a geometrical procedure which is repeated as often as the general enthusiasm warrants it.

"The doctor expects a conscious silence from the auditorium before he gives his men the signal to begin. The signal is accomplished by his raising both arms very slowly, as if with this action he was actually drawing up the spirit of silence from the cellar to the ceiling. The atmosphere is that proper to a seance, and at the psychological moment the doctor, who is the medium, releases the scheduled phenomena. He addresses himself primarily to the instruments seated on his right and left; in consequence of which the listeners have always before them one or the other side of his face. These profiles are charged with unusual feeling, the outward expression of the doctor's consuming reactions to the music he invokes. His exhortations to the first and second fiddle sections are visible to the audience, yet there is that in his beseeching attitude that says: "My frenzy is being watched by a full house—give all that you can—press your fingers and draw your bows with all the strength you have—and do not omit to look up at me whenever convenient."

Concert-Chronicle

May 14

"Skyscrapers" and Mr. Fiedler

A CONDUCTOR could hardly be in more fortunate position than Arthur Fiedler at The Pops. His orchestra likes and respects him; will also work for him. Though the "regular season" is ended at Symphony Hall, it does not demur to three hours of rehearsal when an exacting piece is to be added to the repertory. Once in the concert-room, it adds good will to due diligence; gives back warm and flowing tone, spirited rhythm, a pervading precision and alertness that more than one of Mr. Fiedler's predecessors was unable to command. The audience is as friendly and good-tempered. It likes the range of the programs; is expectant of the "extras"; welcomes the freedom from every musical snobbishness. If a novel piece is in hand, it listens curious and well-disposed.

For the first time, yesterday, Mr. Carpenter's ballet, "Skyscrapers," was played "in concert form" at The Pops. An unaccustomed audience found it a little lengthy, say in the Coney-Island section, but applauded it as heartily as could be expected at first acquaintance. It may hardly have believed its ears when it heard three-quarters of the Symphony Orchestra playing "sweet jazz" and playing it uncommonly well. "A ballet of American life" said the program—evidently a "high-brow" ballet, yet pounding or snapping out discords when Americans were at work, falling into popular idioms when they were at play, quite as though the composer were to the manner born. Indeed he is—this Mr. Carpenter of Chicago, writing for the Metropolitan Opera House and symphony concerts. After Carpenter, Bartók—in six brief Roumanian Dances, so short that the end surprised many, yet not lacking the harsh rhythms, the pungent melodies, the strident or languorous voice he is wont to find in mid-European folk-music. Two modernists on one program. Evidently Mr. Fiedler believes that we listeners like to live in our own time.

Freshly heard and idiomatically played, "Skyscrapers" renewed every impression that sets the ballet high in American music and high among Mr. Carpenter's "works." The beginning, rough-coated with dissonance, piercing and hammering at the ear, is the sound of daily work translated into tones. Nervously and with a din up go our towers of steel and stone. After the day's work, the night's play. To it in crowds; to it with excitement. Thousands of feet shall beat out the syncopated rhythms. Thousands of voices sing the jazzy tunes, half-gay, half-smeary. The sentimental mood deepens and the Spiritual, or something next of kin, sounds. The sportive mood returns; jazz it up. . . . Somewhere in the distance the skyscrapers are looming through the shining night. Soon it will be morning and work again. Mr. Carpenter readily finds his final "apotheosis," as the journeymen of the old ballet called it; finds and also poetizes. American rhythms,

Concert Chronicle

Trans May 15

Cecilia at the Pops

THE "Pops," like their winter brethren, the Symphony Concerts, have their novelties. But let these have the qualities which quickly catch the popular imagination, and they soon cease to be novelties and are added to the regular Pops repertory. Thus not so many years ago the presence of music by Ravel on a Pops program would have been matter for special comment. The presence of his "La Valse" there now leads only to the comment that it has come to take its place side by side with

"L'Arlesienne," the "Flight of the Bumble Bee," the meditation from "Thais" admirably played last evening by Mr. Theodorowicz), and Sousa's march, "Stars and Stripes Forever." Further is it worth noting that its performance was greeted with such volume of applause as to cause Mr. Fiedler bid his men rise to their feet in acknowledgment.

Last evening too had its novelties; novelties which could easily win place in the repertory did they not call for too great an amount of assistance from outside the orchestra. This assistance requires nothing less than a full chorus—provided last evening by the Cecilia Society of which Mr. Fiedler is also the conductor. The reference is to the presence on this program of the "Coronation Scene" from Musorgsky's opera "Boris Godunov," of Henschel's "Morning Hymn," of the Polovtsian Dances out of Borodin's opera "Prince Igor." That these gave pleasure there can be no doubt. For the "Cecilia" was in fine form and Mr. Fiedler conducted with an excellent blending of skill and imagination. Musorgsky's gorgeous music wanted only its pictorial setting to complete its gorgeousness; the chorus provided its portion, the orchestra exceeded that sometimes provided by opera orchestras, Mr. Harry Newcombe sang persuasively the solo passages. And Mr. Fiedler read the score in manner to provide no little thrill. Henschel's "Morning Hymn" sounded as fresh, in its sustained mood, as the day it was first heard. But a final "punch" in an excellent program came from the barbaric dances from "Prince Igor." If memory slips not, it was Dr. Koussevitzky who first brought them to the Symphony Concerts in their choral form. Mr. Monteux has played them as purely orchestral pieces. Thus new are they to the repertory of the orchestra. And now they come to the "Pops." Could the "Cecilia" be a sort of auxiliary chorus to the "Pops" they would keep their place in its repertory. Mr. Fiedler gave to these dances that virility, more, that barbaric energy which is the making of them. From tempo to increased tempo the activity grew wilder. Frenzy followed frenzy in this music. It is putting it mildly to say that the young conductor was masterly in the reading of this score, that chorus and orchestra gave him all he required of them. A. H. M.

Incidents and Prospects

The schedule for next week at The Pops includes the first Sunday concert and the annual "Harvard Night." On Sunday Chaikovsky and lesser Russians will divide the program. Nothing longer than a single symphonic movement will be played. "Harvard Night" falls on Monday, with the Glee Club assisting in eight light numbers, four of which are folk-songs.

Other incidents of the week are a repetition of "Bolero" on Tuesday and of the jazz potpourri from "Jonny spielt auf" on Wednesday. Ferdy Grofe's "Mississippi Suite"—jazz-rhythms and jazzy sentiment astutely blended—is listed for next Thursday; Casella's familiar "Italia" returns on Saturday. On the same evening Prokofiev comes for the first time into The Pops with the second movement of his "Scythian Suite"—the Dance of Black Spirits.

Bax's Second Symphony, confided by the composer to Dr. Koussevitzky for production last winter in Boston and New York, will be played in London next Tuesday. Mr. Goossens will conduct and for the first time the composer will hear his music. American praise has whetted English expectation.

Concert-Chronicle

Trans May 16

Sartorial Suggestion

FROM a correspondent signing herself (or himself) G. C. comes a pleasing fancy submitted herewith to the management of Symphony Hall:

"I have been thinking since The Pops reopened that the rather baroque stage decorations of Symphony Hall call for something more glamorous than formal dress on the members of the orchestra. Why not powdered wigs and court dress? How appropriate these costumes would be, for example, to the "Rosenkavalier" waltzes!

But hardly, if this department may take its turn at suggestion, to the jazz of "Jonny spielt auf" or the melodious haulage of the Volga Bargemen. And fancy a whitened wig upon the raven locks, tossing and confused, of Mr. Fiedler! "No, a thousand times, no!" says the young person who is taking this dictation.

End and Accomplishment

THIS CLIPPING FROM QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER
MAY 17 1930

The Pops at Symphony hall, Boston, though 45 years old, were never younger. Indeed, they have taken a new lease on life and have for their new conductor, Arthur Fiedler, who has in recent seasons attracted a great deal of attention by his obvious and rising talent. Known as the conductor of chamber concerts, of the Esplanade concerts last summer, of the Cecilia Society chorus, as pianist and viola player of the Boston Symphony orchestra, he will be the first Boston conductor of the Pops. Many clubs and organizations engage groups of seats together, and arrange for bus parties from distant points to visit the Pops. Arthur Fiedler's programs are designed to appeal to every element of the Pops' audiences which perhaps are as mixed as any musical public. Programs for the coming week:

Sunday night a Russian-Tschaikowsky program and Monday, "Harvard Night" Orchestra, and Harvard Glee club, will give a varied program.

TUESDAY MAY 20

March, "El Capitan".....Sousa
Overture, "A Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn
Liebesfreud.....Kreisler
Fantasia, "Tosca".....Puccini
Animals' Carnival, Zoological Fantasy.....Saint-Saens
Ave Maria.....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Bolero.....Ravel
Waltz, "Sleeping Beauty"..Tschaikowsky
Dubinushka, Folk Song.....Arranged by Jacchia
Selection, "New Moon".....Romberg

WEDNESDAY, OPERATIC.

Polonaise, "Eugen Onegin"..Tschaikowsky
Overture, "The Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
Song of India, from "Sadko".....Rimsky-Korsakov
Fantasia, "Aida".....Verdi
Prelude and Love Death, "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
Duet, "Hansel and Gretel"..Humperdinck
Introduction to Act 3, "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Selection from "Jonny Spielt Auf".....Krenek
Intermezzo, "Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini

THURSDAY

March, "High School Cadets".....Sousa
Overture, "The Flying Dutchman".....Wagner
Minuet.....Bolzoni
Espana, Rhapsody.....Chabrier
Mississippi Suite.....Grofe
Ave Maria.....Bach-Gounod
Overture Solennelle, "1812" Tschaikowsky
Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner
Dream Melody, "Naughty Marietta".....Herbert
Procession of the Boyards.....Halvorsen

FRIDAY

March, Second Connecticut Regiment.....Reeves
Minuet.....Boccherini
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah".....Saint-Saens
Spanish Suite, "La Feria".....Lacome
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Marche Slave.....Tschaikowsky
Selection, "The Fortune Teller"...Herbert
Waltz, "Blue Danube".....Strauss
American Patrol.....Meacham

SATURDAY

March, "Maple Leaf".....Laurandeau
Overture to "Orpheus".....Offenbach
Valse Triste.....Sibelius
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore".....Verdi
Scythian Suite, Second Movement.....Prokofieff
Largo.....Handel
(Solo violin: Julius Theodorowicz Harp, Organ Strings)
Italia, Rhapsody.....Casella
Selection, "Show Boat".....Kern
Waltz, "Girls of Baden".....Komzak
Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar

Music Notes

May 18 Globe

Events at the Pops this week include the first of the fortnightly Sunday evening programs tonight, devoted to Russian music; the annual Harvard night with numbers by the Harvard Glee Club tomorrow night, an operatic program, including a duet from "Hansel and Gretel" to be sung by Jeska Schwartz Morse and Bernice Fisher Butler, Wednesday night, and the usual array of light music, old and new, on the other nights. The hour of beginning has been shifted from 8:15 to 8:30.

169

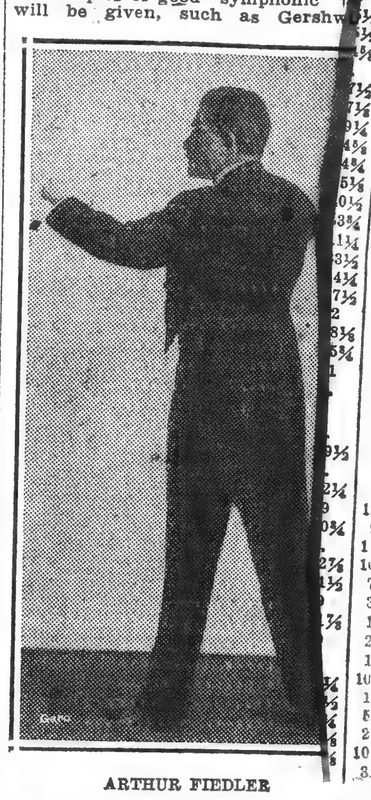
AUDIENCES MORE ATTENTIVE NOW

Fiedler, Conductor of the "Pops," Says People Will Always Appreciate Good Music

"Audiences are much more attentive to music today than were those of past years," says Arthur Fiedler, who is now conducting his first season of the "Pops" concerts. "There may be some slight difficulty in getting started at the beginning of a concert, but as soon as the music begins there is almost immediate quiet."

Mr Fiedler has brought back to the "Pops" the operatic fantasias. Listeners will be able to hear representative works of ultra-modern composers.

Examples of good "symphonic" jazz will be given, such as Gershwin's doubly famous "Rhapsody in Blue" and the later "An American in Paris." Grofe's (pronounced Grow-fay's) "Mississippi Suite" also will be played.



ARTHUR FIEDLER

The new conductor's manner is brisk and impresses one as being the outlet of a large store of energy. He smiles warmly. Collar open at throat, hair tousled, face damp from exertions of rehearsal, Mr Fiedler spoke between puffs on a much enjoyed cigarette. His manner of speaking is quiet yet precise.

Jazz to Disappear

He was talking about future music of the United States, whether there would evolve a music of a distinctly national character other than jazz, and what sort of music would it be?

"I think its characteristics will be the musical utterance of many phases of the mechanistic life of large, modern, American cities. Certain details of the life of the large centers have penetrated to no small extent into the provincial sections and the obscure corners of our country. The widespread distribution and use of modern mass-produced material goods has contributed to the quickening of the national pulse and thus will have an effect upon the musical impulses of all parts of the Nation, as such distribution and use constitutes a common bond of interest between the differing temperaments of North, South, East, and West."

Jazz of the African and Negroid types will, he believes, ultimately disappear. Fiedler regards Honegger, a Frenchman, and Prokofieff, a Russian, although not of this country, to have expressed uncommonly well, in such works as "Pacific 231" and the ballet "Pas D'Acier" ("Steps of Steel" is a literal translation), the mechanistic propensities of turbulent modern American life. He thinks the methods which these composers have used in writing their music and the general spirit of their music will be drawn upon in the native American music of the future. Other compositions which he regards as having helped to point the way are Ernest Bloch's "American Rhapsody," and Frederick S. Converse's "Flivver Ten Million."

First Appearance in Berlin

Mr Fiedler, eminent as violinist, pianist, and player of the viola and celesta, was born here in 1894 and obtained his early education in this city. His first musical training came from his father, Emanuel Fiedler, for 25 years a first violin of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a member of the original Franz Kneisel Quartet.

In Arthur's early 'teens, the elder Fielder retired from the Symphony and the family went to Vienna. Thence, after a short time they moved to Berlin in order that Arthur could attend the Royal Academy of Music there. At that time Arthur was 15 and one of the youngest students enrolled in the academy. His first public appearance was made as a conductor in Berlin when he was 17.

He joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra as viola in 1915 and for a long time was its youngest player. About six years ago Mr Fiedler founded the "Boston Sinfonietta," a small orchestra of about 20 Symphony men. The "Sinfonietta," with Mr Fiedler conducting, has done much modern music written in the smaller forms.

He also is the conductor of the Cecilia Society Chorus. The open-air concerts given on the Charles River Esplanade last Summer were organized and conducted by Mr Fiedler. He is a bachelor.

Grand Opera's Future

During the past few months there has been much splattering of ink concerning the present state and the future of grand opera. Mr Fiedler, asked to give his opinion regarding the presentation of grand opera to modern audiences, answered, with great emphasis, that although the radio exerts a strong influence and reaches a tremendous and otherwise inacessible audience, personal appearances of musical bands never would be entirely displaced by mechanically reproduced music.

He believes that while radio, or opera in the "talkies," may serve to acquaint many people with music hitherto unfamiliar, both devices undoubtedly will whet the appetites of many listeners to hear such music performed by real, live artists.

"I think that with the assistance of people of wealth there are sufficient financial resources in this country to carry on opera permanently. Whereas the metropolitan and Provincial operas of European countries are backed by Government subsidy, opera in America should be assisted by persons of wealth, independent of official position. I don't care what you say, in spite of the radio, there will always be a desire to hear—in the flesh—the two main branches of music, the symphonic orchestra and the opera."

No Reason for Fear

Black—I wonder why a dog puts such an implicit trust in a man?

White—Well, you never heard of a man trying to borrow money off a dog or selling him a used car.—Stray Stories.

tone."

May 17 Globe

The physics laboratory opens new methods of investigation of the beauty of music, according to the dean, who said the reduction of music into its mechanical components makes it possible to penetrate musical secrets which defy ordinary analysis.

"There are scores of ways," he said, "in which we can create beauty by deviation from true pitch, constant intensity and so on. When it can be shown that deviation from pitch in a particular way is beautiful it will be recognized as a principle in art."

Samuel Chotzinoff, in the New York World, recently published the following "musical caricature" of Dr Koussevitzky:

"The Boston Symphony was once the wonder of the world. At the end of the late war it was listed in the class of the maimed and wounded. Frenchmen were imported to cure it, but their ministrations proved to be the medicine of diplomacy. The directors decided to try something Russian and engaged Mr Serge Koussevitzky. Mr Koussevitzky was celebrated as a phenomenal virtuoso on the double bass who, having acquired wealth, assembled an orchestra, chartered a boat and sailed the Volga, bringing symphonic culture to the unlettered inhabitants of the banks of this famous stream. Mr Koussevitzky arrived in Boston, captured the allegiance of the town without a struggle and, coming to Carnegie Hall, was greeted by the public and the press as the resuscitator of the comatose Bostonians.

"And now again, as in pre-war days, the Boston Orchestra fills Carnegie Hall. Dr Koussevitzky has turned the trick—and knows it. There is a unanimous rattle of applause as the elegant doctor makes his appearance, a tribute which has time to grow into a demonstration while he walks leisurely to his platform. He is sleek, and his form is tailored to perfection. He walks like a general who, after having achieved a colossal victory, is prevailed upon to exhibit himself to his grateful countrymen. He knows the psychology that actuates mobs; he also knows his own worth. Before mounting his stand he faces the adoring multitude and remains immovable as if waiting for the applause to rise to proportions sufficiently magnificent to merit his acknowledgment. The thunder having grown large, the doctor lifts his head to the gallery and draws an arc by lowering it (the head) to the first row of the orchestra, a geometrical procedure which is repeated as often as the general enthusiasm warrants it.

"The doctor expects a conscious silence from the auditorium before he gives his men the signal to begin. The signal is accomplished by his raising both arms very slowly, as if with this action he was actually drawing up the spirit of silence from the cellar to the ceiling. The atmosphere is that proper to a seance, and at the psychological moment the doctor, who is the medium, releases the scheduled phenomena. He addresses himself primarily to the instruments seated on his right and left; in consequence of which the listeners have always before them one or the other side of his face. These profiles are charged with unusual feeling, the outward expression of the doctor's consuming reactions to the music he invokes. His exhortations to the first and second fiddle sections are visible to the audience, yet there is that in his beseeching attitude that says: "My frenzy is being watched by a full house—give all that you can—press your fingers and draw your bows with all the strength you have—and do not omit to look up at me whenever convenient."

170

POP PROGRAMS

To the Editor of The Herald:

A correspondent in your paper has taken exception to the present policy of the Pop Concerts, stating that the programs are too jazzy, etc. The organization which produces these concerts, like any other commercial enterprise, is not in business for its health. I have been a constant patron of the Pops since the days when the corks popped an obbligato to the music, and have had a fair opportunity to observe the temper and taste of the audiences. For artistic and educational purposes, the Symphony concerts, running through their long season, would seem to fulfil that object, but the summer public want something lighter and different. I am not prejudiced in that I fully enjoy a symphony by Beethoven, Tchaikowski or Brahms, but, like the majority of Pop patrons, I enjoy lighter selections. If saxophones have invaded the sacred precincts of Symphony hall, surely they are justified in such a brilliant composition as Ravel's "Bolero," which was received with tumultuous applause. The previous season of more classical numbers, with a fading patronage, would seem to uphold my attitude. On the three occasions that I have already attended these new Pops, the hall has been packed. The box office barometer tells the story. WALTER H. DUGAN.

Waverley, May 18.

TO CLOSE THE POPS DISCUSSION

To the Editor of The Herald:

In reply to Mr. Louis Appiebaum's letter Saturday, and his caustic criticism of Arthur Fiedler and his Symphony programs (they are Pop concerts, not heavy classics, which we enjoy through the winter season):

I feel that Mr. Fiedler has met for the first time in the 45 seasons of the Pops a method of amusement and of educating the uncultivated ear to enjoy the true beauties of the highest class of music. I heard him send over "Sweet Adeline" in such a superb way that all jocular memories faded into oblivion and it seemed almost as though a "Verdi" had composed it. "The New Moon," very pretty and tuneful as a light opera, assumed proportions almost unbelievable.

Both only enhanced the understanding of the heavier selections which followed. Romberg, composer of "The New Moon," is a musician, beyond all question. "The Stein Song" Mr. Applebaum refers to, interpreted by Fiedler and his orchestra, will be an absolutely different composition than the rendition by crooning Vallee and his imitators.

Why, when we have had such a God-given privilege as Arthur Fiedler brought to us last summer on the Charles river esplanade, try to pick holes and flaws in things that we don't understand or wouldn't start unravelling? GEORGE KENDALL.

Belmont, May 19.

DANCE MUSIC NIGHT AT POPS

Fiedler Successful With Players and Audience

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The present unprecedentedly popular season of Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall is drawing to a close, but still Mr. Fiedler, adept beyond most of his predecessors in the art of programme making, continues to tempt the musical appetite with ingeniously prepared lists.

Last evening, for example, there was a programme of music of the dance—a most fortunate scheme for a concert that should first of all please the listener. Nor, thanks to Mr. Fiedler's skill and the wide range of his musical sympathies, was there even a hint of the monotony that might have been expected.

For the term "dance" included ballet music from Rameau (by way of Mottl), Stravinsky ("Petrouchka"), and Ponchielli ("La Gioconda"); the festive Polonaise from Tchaikovsky's "Eugen Onegin"; a bit of jazz from Gershwin and a Tango, "Jalousie"; a Strauss waltz; such an esoteric bit as the first of Erik Satie's "Gymnopadies" as orchestrated by Debussy and, of course, the Ravel "Bolero," sensation of the last Symphony season and the reigning hit of the current Pops.

As conductor Mr. Fiedler gains steadily in confidence and authority. There were, to be sure, moments of unsteadiness last evening, and the performance of "Petrouchka" had not quite the Koussevitzkian brilliance. But on the whole the new conductor's touch is both firm and flexible. Despite the surfeit that a waning season brings, the men respond willingly and at times eagerly to his wishes. And the audiences—last night's was no exception—have taken Mr. Fiedler to their hearts.

Pops to Hold Request Night

Pops concerts for this week include the first Request Night and for the first time in years a brand new piece has not only received a place on the annual request program, but the greatest number of votes. Ravel's "Bolero" has proved more popular with this year's audience than the "1812" overture or the "Largo," which have usually headed the list.

The concert scheduled for Sunday evening, June 1, is to be a part of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts' opening exercises to celebrate the tercentenary of the Bay State colony. The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have contributed this concert to the commonwealth for the entertainment of its guests, the Centennial Legion. All other nights are open to the public.

CONTINUING POPS

For the Symphony Hall Pop concerts of the coming week Arthur Fiedler has prepared a set of attractive programmes that avoid the pitfalls of overseriousness and undue frivolity. Again the popular classics and the deserving lighter pieces, whether old or new, have both their due places on his lists.

To mention outstanding items, Ravel's "Bolero," sensation of the Pops as of the preceding Symphony season, will be repeated on Monday evening. On Tuesday will be heard the music of the Flower Maidens from Wagner's "Parsifal," seldom performed outside the opera house. Wednesday brings Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala" and Tchaikovsky's "Slavic March," while Thursday is the annual "request night," with "Bolero" as the piece most favored by the balloters.

Pieces suitably patriotic will be played on Friday, which is decoration Day, and there will be the usual popular programme on Saturday evening.

The concert scheduled for Sunday evening, June 1, is to be a part of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts' opening exercises to celebrate the tercentenary of the Bay State Colony. The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have contributed this concert to the Commonwealth for the entertainment of its guests, the Centennial Legion.

* * * *

REQUEST BILL AT POPS

The ballot box at Symphony hall having been closed and the votes counted, Arthur Fiedler's first request program at the Pops is announced. On Request Night, next Thursday, the Pops public will hear a program entirely of its own choice.

Much interest attaches to two new pieces upon the program, all the other numbers having appeared on request programs of previous seasons. Ravel's "Bolero," the first of these, led in the number of votes by a large margin. "Bolero," recently written by Ravel, who is considered the foremost of living French composers, was introduced here by Serge Koussevitzky last winter.

The other piece new to request programs is Gershwin's "Rapsody in Blue." This also had a large vote, despite the fact that it has not yet been played at the Pop concerts this season.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Summer Music In America

The musical season in the principal American cities is still supposed to end by May 1 at the latest, and not to commence until October. But in recent years more and more Summer music, performed for the most part out of doors, has been offered in American cities.

A tourist whose principal interest is in music might now, instead of making the customary tour of Europe from Bayreuth to Munich to Salzburg to Verona and so on through a long list of European cities where Summer music is offered, make a tour of these United States so numerous, and so varied are the concerts and operatic performances to be given in this country the coming Summer. Let us enumerate casually some of what such a musical tourist could find in the United States between now and Oct 1, next.

In Boston there will presumably be the Esplanade concerts by an orchestra of about 50 Boston Symphony men, offering nightly programs of popular classics free of charge. These will, if given, follow the Pops season at Symphony Hall, which closes about July 4. This year a number of special concerts by such choral societies as the Handel and Haydn are planned for the several parks in Boston as part of the tercentenary celebration.

In New York there is the usual season of Summer symphony concerts at the Lewisohn Stadium, by the Philharmonic Orchestra, nightly from July 7 to Aug 31. Willem van Hoogstraten and Alfred Coates will conduct Beethoven Choral Symphony and the Verdi Requiem are announced as special features. The usual programs are of a much higher standard than those of the Pops and the Esplanade concerts in Boston. They approximate those given by the Boston Symphony in its subscription series during the Winter. These Stadium concerts are made possible by the generosity of public-spirited citizens of New York. The price of admission is 25 cents to a $1, so that a deficit is inevitable.

Chicago's Summer Opera

In Philadelphia the Philadelphia Orchestra, conducted by Alexander Smallens, will give outdoor Symphony concerts at Fairmount Park nightly for eight weeks, beginning July 7. These concerts are planned to be on a par with the Stadium concerts in New York. The price of tickets is the same, 25 cents to $1, with a concession in this case to purchasers of subscription series tickets. This is the first year of these Philadelphia concerts, and on the popular response will depend their continuance.

In Chicago, or rather at Ravinia Park, just outside the city, there is again to be a season of grand opera at which principal singers from the Chicago and Metropolitan Operas will appear. The Chicago Symphony Orchestra plays for the opera and gives a number of symphony concerts besides under Eric Delamarter, its assistant conductor. The 19th season at Ravinia begins June 21 and runs for 10 weeks. Among the celebrated singers to appear are Lucrezia Bori, Elizabeth Rethberg, Giovanni Marinelli, and Edward Johnson, principals from the Metropolitan Opera; and Florence Macbeth, Virgilio Lazzari, Desire Defrere, Giuseppe Cavadore, and Vittorio Trevisan, principals from the Chicago Civic Opera. The repertory includes many standard French and Italian operas, also some relatively unfamiliar works, such as Rabaud's "Marouf," and Puccini's "Rondine."

No comparable Summer season of French and Italian opera is offered anywhere else in the world. The only comparable opera in Summer in Europe is the German performances at such cities as Munich. Louis Eckstein, president of the Ravinia Company, is financially responsible for this remarkable Chicago enterprise. The deficit on last year's season was said to be $70,000. Audiences were very large, and press comment enthusiastic, but this sort of thing cannot make money.

Pacific Coast Concerts

On the Pacific Coast there are important orchestral concerts in Summer. At the Hollywood Bowl, near Los Angeles, the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra, one of the best in America, gives a long series of open-air concerts, under various distinguished conductors, including for the season to begin July 8 next Molinari, Arbes and Alfred Mertz, among others. Soloists engaged for this Summer at Hollywood include Elsa Alsen, Richard Crooks, Percy Grainger and Margaret Matzenauer.

Near San Francisco there is also a Summer orchestral series, with such distinguished guest conductors as Bruno Walter. These California Summer concerts are of true symphonic caliber, not like our Pops, but like the New York Stadium concerts.

Smaller American cities, some of them, have important Summer music, notably Cincinnati, where the Zoo Opera gives a series of performances comparable in scope to those of the San Carlo Opera in its best days. Even Syracuse, N Y, a city in the class with Providence and Worcester, announces for this Summer open-air concerts by a symphony orchestra of 80 players, sponsored by Syracuse University.

St Louis has a musical enterprise of its own, under municipal auspices, a Summer season of light opera by an excellent company. This year's repertory includes such recent favorites as "Show Boat," "Blossom Time," "The Desert Song" and Romberg's new "Nina Rose," tried out in Chicago last Spring and to be given in New York next Fall. Sixteen hundred free seats nightly and thousands of better ones at from $2 down to 25 cents permit huge audiences. This year is the 12th season of the St Louis Municipal Opera. The audiences during the past 11 seasons have totalled 4,140,139 persons, according to the enterprising publicity department of the company.

Nor does this exhaust the list of Summer music in America. The enumeration should suffice to prove, however, that a musician might well conclude to "see (or rather hear) America first."

Programs of the Week

SYMPHONY HALL. Evenings 8:30 to 10:45—The Pops, Arthur Fiedler, conductor.

Monday Evening, June 9—March, "Queen of Sheaba" (Gounod); overture, "A Mid-Summer Night's Dream" (Mendelssohn); "Kammenoi Ostrow" (Rubinstein); fantasia, "Samson and Delilah" (Saint-Saens); "Espana" (Chabrier); violin solo, "Carmen Fantasy" (Bizet-Sarasate), Nicolai Kassman; "An American in Paris" (Gershwin); waltz, "La Bacarolle" (Waldteufel); "Volga Bargemen's Song" (arranged by Jacchia); "Marche Slave" (Tschaikowsky3.

Tuesday Evening, June 10—March, "Father of Victory" (Ganne); overture to "Egmont" (Beethoven); "Spring" (Grieg); fantasia, "La Tosca" (Puccini); prelude and love-death, "Tristan und Isolde" (Wagner); march from "The Love for Three Oranges" (Prokofieff); Fourth Symphony, finale (Tschaikowsky); selection, "The Fortune Teller" (Herbert); waltz, "Estudiantina" Waldteufel); "Sixth Hungarian Dance" (Brahms); "America."

Wednesday Evening, June 11—Prelude to "Carmen" (Bizet); overture to "Rienzi" (Wagner); "En Sourdine" (Tellam); Fantasia, "Il Trovatore" (Verdi); "Finlandia" (Sibelius); "Ave Maria" (Bach-Gounod); overture solemnelle, "1812" (Tschaikowsky); selection, "Eileen" (Herbert); waltz, "Vienna Blood" (Strauss); Triumphal March from "Aida" (Verdi).

Thursday Evening, June 12—"Entrance of the Guests Into the Wartburg" (Wagner); overture to "William Tell" (Rossini); Fantasia, "Carmen" (Bizet); Tufts Songs; "Bolero" (Ravel); marimba solos by Lawrence White, "I Love Thee" (Grieg), "The Rosary" (Nevin), "Scherzzo Tarentelle" (Wienawski); Tufts songs; selection, "Sweet Adeline" (Kern); "Love Dream" (Liszt-Herbert); "Strike Up the Band" (Gershwin).

Friday Evening, June 13—Wedding March, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" (Mendelssohn); overture to "Der Freischutz" (Weber); prelude to "The Deluge" (Saint-Saens); fantasia, "Madame Butterfly" (Puccini); "Scythian Suite" (Prokofieff); "Hindu Song" (Rimsky-Korsakov); overture to "Rienzi" (Wagner); selection, "New Moon" (Romberg); "At Dawning" (Cadman-Herbert); "Procession of Bacchus" (Delibes).

Saturday Evening, June 14—March, "Semper Fidelis" (Sousa); overture, "The Roman Carnival" (Berlioz); "Ave Maria" (Schubert-Wilhelmj); fantasia, "Faust" (Gounod); "Irish Rhapsody" (Herbert); "Valse Trieste" (Sibelius); "Les Preludes" (Liszt); selection, "Fifty Million Frenchmen" (Porter); "Volga Bargemen's Song" (arrangement by Jacchia); "Espana" (Chabrier).

Sunday Evening, June 15—Overture to "Leonore," No. 2, opus 72 (Beethoven); Concerto in D Minor for two violins and string orchestra (Bach), solo violins, Julius Theodorowicz and Robert Gundersen; "Bolero" (Ravel); prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnburg," prelude to "Lohengrin," "The Ride of the Valkyries" from "Die Walkure," overture to "Tannhauser" (Wagner).

Music Notes and Comment

Mr Fiedler has chosen his program for the next Sunday Pop concert, June 15, from Beethoven, Bach and Wagner, with the addition of Ravel's inevitable Bolero. There is no concert tonight. All nights this week are open to the public, and the programs include some novelties as well as many old favorites. The request program will be repeated June 17, so that the hundreds unable to get in to hear it on request night might have another opportunity. The management announces that the attendance this season is the largest in the entire history of the Pops.

Tonight at 8:30, in the Copley-Plaza Hotel, the People's Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr Henry Hadley, will present what is announced as "a special Boston program of high-class music" for the 35th annual convention of the American Federation of Musicians. Admission is by invitation only. The concert is not open to the general public.

Announcements of Boston concerts next season have begun to arrive. Claire Clairbert, a new coloratura soprano from Brussels, who makes her American debut in opera at San Francisco Sept 13, will give her first Boston recital at Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, Nov 9. Kreutzberg and Georgi, dancers, will reappear at Symphony Hall Nov 20. Miss Clairbert is regarded by her manager as an unusual "find," and a genuinely impressive array of press notices and testimonials accompanies the announcement of her Boston debut. A coloratura of the first rank, capable, as this one is said to be, of filling such roles as Manon and Violetta, as well as more strictly coloratura parts, is something much to be desired these days. No successor to Galli-Curci is yet in sight, and her career, though by no means ended, cannot last more than, let us say, 20 years more.

Lawrence Tibbett's final concert of the season just ended was sung in Chicago, May 8. His concluding opera engagement of the season came two days later at Cleveland, as Germont in the Metropolitan Opera Company's performance of "Traviata," in the Auditorium there. Immediately afterward he left for California, where he will at once begin his new talkie picture, "The New Moon," at the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer studios in Culver City. During the next 24 weeks Tibbett is to complete two feature talkie pictures there before beginning his next season of concert and opera. Through this new medium Tibbett is reaching the general public. On completion of these latest talkies, the baritone will make a concert tour, which engages him up to Jan 9, when he will rejoin the Metropolitan Opera Company in New York for the balance of the season.

Mme Galli-Curci, following a Summer's vacation at her estate, Sul Monte in the Catskills, sails early next October to fulfill a concert tour of the British Isles during that month, November and December. Her managers have signed contracts for 32 engagements to be sung by her in England, Scotland, Wales and Ireland. This will mark Mme Galli-Curci's second tour of the British Isles. These contracts concluded, Mme Galli-Curci returns to America for an extensive concert tour during the Winter and Spring, when she will appear in the East, South and Middle West.

Tito Schipa ended his activities of the recent concert season with a recital April 29, and a broadcast over the Victor hour May 1, sailing the following day, with his family, for Europe. There he is to sing concerts in Italy and one in Paris before embarking June 1st for opera engagements in South America. During his stay there, being Winter months south of the Equator, Schipa will sing 20 opera performances in the Teatro Colon, Buenos Ayres, concluding about Aug 25, and afterward make 10 appearances in opera in Santiago, Chile, at the Teatro Municipale, completing the series of engagements at the end of September. Returning direct to Europe, Schipa is to make a Continental tour in opera and concert, arriving in America for his annual engagements with the Chicago Opera Company in that city, which extends through December and January. The tenor's opera and concert appearance in this country will last up until May of next year.

The report that Maria Jeritza, star of the Metropolitan Opera Company, purposed to sever her relations with that company next season and embark on a three-year world tour, starting in August, under the management of F. C. Coppicus of the Metropolitan Musical Bureau, has been categorically denied in person by Giulio Gatti-Casazza, general director of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and by representatives of the bureau in question.

If Paderewski carries out his intention of making a seventeenth tour of the United States he will begin it approximately thirty-nine years after his initial tour of this country. The Polish pianist played first in Boston in the Autumn of 1891, which was also the Autumn of his 31st birthday. The sensation that he created then has never been forgotten. It repeated the sensation of his London debut in May, 1890.

He is said to have recovered entirely from his appendicitis operation of last September and to be ready for the 75 American concerts now booked for him. Two recitals each have been arranged in New York, Boston and Chicago. The present Summer he will spend at his chateau at Morges, Switzerland.—New York Telegram.

Music Notes and Comment

Tonight at ymphony Hall there will be a special concert by 95 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given for the Centennial Legion by the Tercentenary Commission. This is not open to the public.

At the Pops this week the Monday night program includes a group by American composers. Chadwick's Sinfonietta, Converse's "Flivver Ten Million," Carl McKinley's "Masquerades," and Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue are the chosen pieces. It is noteworthy that three of these composers are resident in Boston. The piano part in Gershwin's celebrated rhapsody will again be played by Mr Sanroma, as it was on last week's request program. Friday is Tech night, open, however, to the public. The program as a whole shows that Mr Fiedler is following out the wishes of the patrons of the concerts as expressed in the voting for the request program, which includes a number of old favorites and two new ones, Ravel's Bolero, which won more votes than anything else, and Gershwin's Rhapsody.

Fifth Week of Pops, Symphony

Tonight at Symphony Hall the Pop Concerts enter upon their fifth week with a concert of 95 members of the Symphony Orchestra at which the Centennial Legion will be the guests of the Massachusetts Bay Colony Tercentenary Commission of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. The concert is not open to the general public.

From Monday evening through Saturday the Pops follow their regular course. No special nights are announced, though the concert of Monday evening will be liberally patronized by students and graduates of the New England Conservatory and music by three members of the faculty, Messrs. Chadwick, Converse and McKinley figure on the programme. Jesus Maria Sanroma of the pianoforte department will play the solo part in Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue."

Mr. Fiedler's programme for the remaining concerts are true to the present policy of making the Pops somewhat more popular without neglecting entirely the serious side of music. On every list is to be found a beginning and generally a closing march, a standard overture, an operatic fantasia and in most cases a light opera selection. Ravel's "Bolero," the particular hit of the season, will be repeated on Thursday evening.

Pops Concert for Visitors

A remarkably impressive ceremony attended the special concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night. Crowding the hall for the occasion, which was the official opening of the Massachusetts Bay Colony Tercentenary, were the guests of the Commonwealth. The honored guests were the Centennial Legion, composed of military organizations from the Thirteen Original States.

Addresses of welcome were delivered in behalf of the Commonwealth by Governor Allen, and for the city by Thomas A. Mullen, member of the city industrial commission, in the absence of Mayor Curley. The musical program, in which 95 members of the orchestra participated, was conducted by Arthur Fiedler. The concert was a gift of the trustees of the orchestra to the Commonwealth as its tercentenary contribution.

The program began with Reeves "Second Connecticut Regiment" march, and ended with Victor Herbert's "American Fantasy." Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever" added to the patriotic coloring, while the program itself was printed in red, white and blue.

The audience was very enthusiastic.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Music With Color and Light

The committee in charge of the observance of the Tercentenary of the Massachusetts Bay Colony was reported last week as considering the use this Summer of the "clavilux," or light organ. The idea under discussion was to place the clavilux on a float to be anchored in the Charles River Basin, where its play of light and color could be watched by persons listening to the Esplanade concerts.

This, by the way, was the first intimation this season that Esplanade concerts are again to be given, presumably by an orchestra of Boston Symphony men, to be conducted by Arthur Fiedler. It must not be taken as official, though the continuance of the concerts was forecast last Fall. Some readers may be curious about the "clavilux," and about the idea of combining music with light and color.

The clavilux is the invention of an American, Thomas Wilfrid. It has been shown publicly on several occasions in this city. Ever-shifting rays of light are thrown on a screen. The play of form and color, which can be made to take a wider variety of shapes, is, in the opinion of the inventor, a new art, capable of standing alone, giving aesthetic pleasure of a new kind. This new art lends itself readily, it is claimed, to combination with music.

For nearly two centuries, and perhaps for longer than that, some people interested in music have persisted in finding importance in the psychological phenomenon known as color audition. Many people when they listen to music can at will see in their mind's eye a great variety of color.

From the days of an 18th century Jesuit father, named Catel, who published a work on the subject, attempts have been made to identify certain colors with certain tones in the musical scale. The note C, for example, would be to some ears red, the note F green, and so on. The difficulty has been that no two investigators of color audition have fitted the same color to the same tone. C for some would not be red, but blue, and F not green, but yellow.

Color Audition

There is no doubt, however, that the phenomenon of color audition is genuine. The writer of these lines, and probabaly some readers of them, can at will see colors, even pictures, while listening to music. But no two listeners agree on seeing the same picture, or the same color scheme, for the same music.

Composers, too, have played with the idea of color audition. Skriabin's tone poem, "Prometheus," has directions in the score that a play of colored lights on a screen should accompany every orchestral performance of it. Attempts have been made on single occasions in Moscow, and in New York, to carry out these directions. But the results have not been sufficiently impressive to make the use of the lights obligatory.

Schoenberg's little "drama with music," "Die Glueckliche Hand," was intended as a blend of pantomime, music and an elaborate scheme of light effects designed to convey the sequence of moods in the piece. But most of these light effects seem to have been missing from the recent New York performance by the League of Composers and the Philadelphia Orchestra, to judge from reviews. Other similar instances could readily be collected from the works of various composers, some of them less modern than Schoenberg and Skriabin.

Up to the present no elaborate or thoroughgoing attempts have been made in Boston to demonstrate the artistic possibilities of combining music with light and color. When the Boston Symphony plays Skraibin "Prometheus" the lights by which the composer set such store are omitted. It will, therefore, be interesting to observe the results of combining the clavilux with the Esplanade concerts, should the proposed scheme be carried out.

Nor is this device the only one perfected to attain the end of making a "light organ." There have been and are a number of other "light organs." In recent years in this country, however, Mr Wilfred's invention has tended to monopolize the field. Whether this is due to its superiority to all other devices only those who have seen the others can say.

The clavilux is certainly a novel and interesting [illegible] to watch. But one spectator [illegible] effect a bit monotonou[illegible] first half-hour.

Music in Boston

The Pops

Arthur Fiedler and his orchestra of symphony players drew a large and enthusiastic audience to Symphony Hall last evening to listen to a symphonic-Wagner program. And an excellent program it was, initiated by Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 3, enhanced by Bach's D minor Concerto for two violins and string orchestra with Julius Theodorowicz and Robert Gundersen to play the solos, punctuated halfway through by the "Bolero" of the gamesome M. Ravel, and concluded with four Wagnerian pieces, the preludes to "Meistersinger" and "Lohengrin," the overture to "Tannhäuser," and the "Ride of the Valkyries" from "Die Walküre."

At this late date in the Pops season Mr. Fiedler might well have been forgiven a slackened performance. Yet in very few places did his men show the desultoriness which sometimes invades at this time of year. Attacks were firm and concise. The strings maintained the firm, warm, velvety tone which is their usual characteristic. The new leader retains the verve and elastic vigor which infuse his readings with life and colorfulness. The Beethoven was crisp, brilliant, and sufficiently emotional. The melodies of the Bach Concerto were announced incisively and eloquently. Mr. Theodorowicz and Mr. Gundersen exhibited musicianliness and technical adroitness. "Bolero" bounced along in its invincible rhythms. Of the Wagnerian pieces, the most compelling interpretation was that of the strident Valkyries. The "Tannhäuser" Overture was well planned, and turned out in a workmanlike manner, but it gave little evidence of the burning depths latent in the score.

As a program maker for this type of concert, Mr. Fiedler might hardly be bettered. So adroitly does he combine the somber with the brilliant, the light with the weighty, that only analysis reveals the fact that with each program he is courting that varied and large company which now frequent a rejuvenated and revivified Pops.

For tonight's concert the entire hall has been taken over by Boston University. Other nights will be open to the public. The request program will be repeated tomorrow night. Saint-Saëns's "Animals' Carnival" will be a feature of the Wednesday program. Thursday night brings a novelty—a program of music for the dance, from the eighteenth century to George Gershwin. Gershwin's music will be featured again Saturday night, with "An American in Paris" and the "Rhapsody in Blue" on the list.

MUSIC

POP CONCERT

An audience surprisingly large for a very warm evening voiced heartiest approval of the program of old musical friends presented last night by Arthur Fiedler and his orchestra as the 37th offering of the season in Symphony hall. The selections chosen afforded an entertainment free from monotony, varied in feeling and intensity by turns appealing in delicacy of harmony, amusing and suggestive of hilarity, or bursting forth with grandeur and richness that stirred the imagination. The concert began with Beethoven's overture to Leonore, continuing with the concerto in D minor by Bach. Mr. Theodorowicz and Mr. Gundersen well deserved the tumult of applause which greeted their rendition of the violin solos and duets.

With every repetition of Ravel's picturesque "Bolero," it seems that it grows in favor, and last night's audience indicated by laughter in the eyes and intent following of the fast-increasing tempo and volume of tone that the "Bolero" was becoming an intimate acquaintance, and that the hearers were almost seeing a company of phantom dancers rollicking in time to the music. For the final group there were four superb Wagnerian numbers, the prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," the prelude to "Lohengrin," the magnificent "Ride of the Valkyries" and the finely-shaded overture to "Tannhauser." Because of the general character of the program, no encores were given.

F. A. B.

Gossip of the Town

Boston's greatest stage-door sensation since the passing of the matinee-idol era, they tell us, is Arthur Fiedler, violinist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and now its Pops conductor. There are those who insist that the adoration of his many women-fans has got to the point where it has ceased to amuse him and begun to border on annoyance and there are those who'll tell you he enormously enjoys the whole situation. If you ask the girls about it point-blank they'll tell you he carries about him a romantic-Bohemian air, plus something very Bostonese which distinguishes this really native New Englander from the average "dashing foreigner."

From those who speak more or less officially, comes the data that there are more opera-glasses down front at the present Pops than ever before in the history of the concerts. To put it dramatically, once upon a time when some highly popular piece of music was to be played by the orchestra the comment would be a delighted: "Ah, the Liebeslied is next." But nowadays it is: "Ah, here comes Arthur Fiedler." When he comes out at the stage-door of Symphony Hall there is the inevitable group of tittering girls and women who stand about in groups, trying painfully hard to pretend they are there for any reason at all under the sun except to see their baton-wielding idol.

And what does Mr. Fiedler do? He merely glances up the street and down, his gaze directed rather up to the northern star and the dipper. Adjusts his camel-hair coat somewhat and his sheaf of music—probably music that is—and finally tumbles into his simple, rather ramshackle, and somewhat battered automobile and is off. If you listen close you can almost hear the faintly audible: "Ah, there goes Arthur Fiedler."

* * * *

the Prince of Wales [illegible] for more than two years.

Advertisement

POPS CONCERTS SET ATTENDANCE RECORDS

This, the 45th season of Pop concerts at Symphony Hall and the first under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, has to date broken all attendance records, proof positive that Mr. Fiedler's programmes and his conducting of them have captured the public's fancy.

During the coming week the concerts will run true to their present form. On each programme will be music to appeal to nearly every taste; only the extremes of seriousness and triviality are avoided. On Monday George Gershwin's amusing fantasy, "An American in Paris," has place on the programme. Thursday is the annual Tufts night and a feature of the programme will be a group of marimba solos by Lawrence White.

Honegger's "Pacific 231," the epic of the locomotive, will be played on Friday. Saturday's programme is as usual of a frankly popular character, while that of the following evening is more substantial, featuring the music of Beethovan, Bach and Wagner with Ravel's "Bolero" for good measure.

A Symphonic Pops And Mr. Fiedler

AFTER a sweltering midsummer day, one turned one's way last evening to the Pops. For the thirty-seventh program of the season Mr. Fiedler, following the custom of recent years, had arranged a "symphonic" evening. The second half of his program was "all-Wagner"; the first ranged through Beethoven, Bach and Ravel. For the hearing, on this day of torrid temperatures, Symphony Hall, upstairs and down, was well filled, expressed approval by applause which went well beyond routine.

Mr. Fiedler began with Beethoven's overture, "Leonore, No. 3." For Pops as for winter concerts came the meditative measures, the tumults and ardors, the stirring and martial trumpet calls, the concentrated drama which epitomizes the whole of the operatic action of the composer's "Fidelio." Next Mr. Theodorowicz and Mr. Gundersen played the three movements of Bach's Concerto in D minor for two violins. If from the mazes of Bach's counterpoint one would single out one particular thing above all others, it would probably be his amazing rhythmic vitality. With regard for this dominant Bachian characteristic the two violinists played the concerto—or at least the first and last movement of it. While the melting dissonances and the suave melodic lines of the middle movement brought a Bach from another world.

But it was Ravel's "Bolero" which received the warmest approval on this hot evening Introduced for the first time this last season, it is already a prime favorite at the "Pops." Few pieces have been more frequently played this summer. And audiences "cry for more." Mr. Fiedler paces it at Koussevitzkian (and Ravellian) tempo; holds in restraint through many repetitions its tremendous powers; finally, and gradually releases them, urging toward the end his men to greater and greater energies. The result is the one result which the piece was designed to bring: overpowering tension and its final fulfillment. But "Bolero" has its by-products also: in the intermission one heard it whistled in the hall!—The sophisticated brain-created melody of a Ravel a subject for a casual whistler!

From Wagner's music-dramas Mr. Fiedler played four selections: the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," the prelude to "Lohengrin," the "Ride of the Valkyries," the overture to "Tannhäuser." Skillfully Mr. Fiedler pictured the dignity and the pomp as well as the humor of the guild-singers of old, the religious solemnity of pilgrims and the voluptuousness of the Venusberg of ancient legend, the pounding flight of the steeds of demi-divine warrior-maidens finding their way through clouds and air, the exaltation which is the essence of the crescendos and climaxes of the prelude to "Lohengrin."—The standard of the playing at the Pops remains at the high level at which it began. Mr. Fiedler is able and imaginative and forceful conductor. And the audiences warm to him.

A. H. M.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

POP CONCERTS

The 45th season of the Pop concerts in Boston were inaugurated this past month amid scenes of enthusiasm such as have not graced a similar occasion for years Symphony hall has been redecorated to mark the beginning of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 50th year, and Boston's Tercentenary by Robert E. Jones, distinguished young American draftsman of many important stage settings, including those of the Russian Ballet, John Barrymore's "Hamlet", Marc Connelly's "Green Pastures" and Schonberg's "Die Gluckliche Hand." The color scheme is green,gray and gold.

When Arthur Fiedler, first active Bostonian conductor of these concerts, came to the pedium, he received an ovation from the audience which filled the hall. He is a member of the orchestra, playing the viola and celesta. The Pops have always been attractive, but in the last few years have experienced a slight slump, caused apparently by a conductorial tendency to turn them into symphonic rites at which audiences were expected to listen in awesome silence. It is Mr. Fiedler's task to restore to the Pops their original nature, that of an agreeable entertainment at which one may hear light tuneful music, expertly played, and to speak to one's neighbor, sip a cold drink and even perhaps drop a spoon without fear of being expelled from the hall.

The programs have contained so far the interesting "Bolere" of Ravel", "Berceuse" of Stravinsky, Respighi's "Pines of Rome", plenty of old favorites, and selections from Krenek's jazz opera, "Johnny Spielt Auf", which in the last two years has been preferred in every opera house and has made its composer a fortune.

* * *

172

Globe June 27 '30

THIRD OF SUNDAY POP CONCERTS

Globe J 16

"Symphonic-Wagner" and "Bolero" Program

The seventh week of the current Pops season opened last evening with a Sunady evening concert, the third of the season and the second open to the public, with a program described as "Symphonic Wagner."

From Beethoven came the "Leonore Overture No. 3"; from Bach the Concerto in D minor for two violins and string orchestra. For the Wagner portion, the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" and that to "Lohengrin"; the "Ride of the Valkyries" from "Die Walkuere"; and the Overture to "Tannhaeuser." And by no means least, from the audience's point of view, Ravel's "Bolero."

This program was the first this season to approximate an evening devoted to important symphonic music. The auditorium was well filled despite the oppressive weather and interests out of doors.

Messrs Theodorowicz and Gundersen were the soloists in the Bach concerto. The general excellence of their playing was great indeed. Pleasing to a high degree were the smoothly flowing, limpid melodies of the Largo.

Mr Fiedler displayed impressive ability in the taxing program and deservedly received from the listeners evidences of full approval. His conducting was almost always authoritative and keenly planned; choice of tempi and dynamic qualities were generally tasteful and musicianly.

As much as one enjoyed the balance of the program, one did not hold in equal regard Mr Fiedler's performance of the "Tannhaeuser" excerpt. In this it seemed that tempi were frequently too retarded and that the quality of tone sometimes was not of the best.

"Bolero" held its favor and last evening's audience, which demonstrated fully its enjoyment of the insistent rhythm and the carefree melodic content of this ingenious and irrestistible piece.

POPS HISTORY RIVALS THAT OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

By MOSES SMITH

There must be many people who, like myself, didn't realize that the now permanent Boston institution—the Pops—has a history almost coincidental with that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In 1885, four years after the establishment of the orchestra by Major Henry L. Higginson, it became apparent that in order to attract the desired European musicians something more than the short symphony would have to be offered. That was why the Pops concerts came into existence that year, with one Neuendorff, operatic conductor, at the helm. The Pops concerts have continued ever since, with one notable exception. As in the case of the regular symphony concerts, they were held in the old Boston Music Hall, on the spot where Loew's Orpheum now stands. The model was borrowed from the "Bilse" concerts in Berlin. In place of rows of seats, tables and chairs; in place of symphonic fare, Strauss waltzes, marches, operatic pieces and an occasional weightier number, in place of silent music-worshippers, gay and chattering folk sipping—or drinking—wine and beer, munching a pretzel or a sandwich.

Arthur Fiedler

These Pops concerts have had an outward physiognomy more or less similar from their beginning down to our time. But the time spent in looking into old program books is well paid for by the interesting and often amusing facts one unearths.

Take the case of the "missing" season, 1890. In that year the manager of the orchestra, Charles A. Ellis, while away on a tour, neglected to apply for the necessary liquor license on time. As a result, there were no Pops concerts in that year, for without liquor Pops were unthinkable. Now times have changed!

There is no doubt that the element of music, in those days, was of secondary interest. And why not? As late as 1900 one reads on the bill of fare that a lobster salad was obtained for 40 cents. A glass of claret or Rhine wine cost 15 cents. But enough of this, before the reader faints!

At least once a year there was a "Bicycle" night. Bicycles were checked free, and, to add to the gaiety of the nineties, numbers of the program began with successive initials of the word "bicycle." If these amusements seem tame to our sophisticated 1930 generation let us look in on a Harvard night of 40 years ago. The students, somewhat the worse, as the phrase went, for liquor, became obstreperous. And on one occasion the conductor, Timothee Adamowski, became so enraged at the bedlam that he walked off the stage and refused to come back!

The programs show what progress has taken place in the cultivation of musical taste. Galops and gavottes, waltzes, and marches appear in great plenty. Symphonic music was not entirely neglected, but it was more nearly the execptional thing than is true today. Then, as now, operatic music was always a favorite.

The request programs of 40 odd years ago surprise us by containing almost nothing of the modern request program. On June 28, 1886, for example, the only numbers that might appear on a current request program were the "Ride of the Valkyrs" and Berlioz' "Rackoczy" march. And, more remarkable, there seems to have been no especial demand for the "Blue Danube" waltz. To call the roll of conductors would include such names as John C. Mullaly (who is still living in this city), Kneisel, Adamowski, Gruenberg, Max Zach, Strube, A. Maguarre, Clement Lenom, and, more recently, Agide Jacchia and Alfredo Casella.

Finally we have Arthur Fiedler, youthful and ingratiating, as popular as any, very likely, in the long history of Pops, revitalizing an institution that threatened to succumb to decay. More power to his good right arm!

POPS HISTORY RIVALS THAT OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

June 27 American

By MOSES SMITH

There must be many people who, like myself, didn't realize that the now permanent Boston institution—the Pops—has a history almost coincidental with that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In 1885, four years after the establishment of the orchestra by Major Henry L. Higginson, it became apparent that in order to attract the desired European musicians something more than the short symphony would have to be offered. That was why the Pops concerts came into existence that year, with one Neuendorff, operatic conductor, at the helm. The Pops concerts have continued ever since, with one notable exception. As in the case of the regular symphony concerts, they were held in the old Boston Music Hall, on the spot where Loew's Orpheum now stands. The model was borrowed from the "Bilse" concerts in Berlin. In place of rows of seats, tables and chairs; in place of symphonic fare, Strauss waltzes, marches, operatic pieces and an occasional weightier number, in place of silent music-worshippers, gay and chattering folk sipping—or drinking—wine and beer, munching a pretzel or a sandwich.

Arthur Fiedler

These Pops concerts have had an outward physiognomy more or less similar from their beginning down to our time. But the time spent in looking into old program books is well paid for by the interesting and often amusing facts one unearths.

Take the case of the "missing" season, 1890. In that year the manager of the orchestra, Charles A. Ellis, while away on a tour, neglected to apply for the necessary liquor license on time. As a result, there were no Pops concerts in that year, for without liquor Pops were unthinkable. Now times have changed!

There is no doubt that the element of music, in those days, was of secondary interest. And why not? As late as 1900 one reads on the bill of fare that a lobster salad was obtained for 40 cents. A glass of claret or Rhine wine cost 15 cents. But enough of this, before the reader faints!

At least once a year there was a "Bicycle" night. Bicycles were checked free, and, to add to the gaiety of the nineties, numbers of the program began with successive initials of the word "bicycle." If these amusements seem tame to our sophisticated 1930 generation let us look in on a Harvard night of 40 years ago. The students, somewhat the worse, as the phrase went, for liquor, became obstreperous. And on one occasion the conductor, Timothee Adamowski, became so enraged at the bedlam that he walked off the stage and refused to come back!

The programs show what progress has taken place in the cultivation of musical taste. Galops and gavottes, waltzes, and marches appear in great plenty. Symphonic music was not entirely neglected, but it was more nearly the execptional thing than is true today. Then, as now, operatic music was always a favorite.

The request programs of 40 odd years ago surprise us by containing almost nothing of the modern request program. On June 28, 1886, for example, the only numbers that might appear on a current request program were the "Ride of the Valkyrs" and Berlioz' "Rackoczy" march. And, more remarkable, there seems to have been no especial demand for the "Blue Danube" waltz. To call the roll of conductors would include such names as John C. Mullaly (who is still living in this city), Kneisel, Adamowski, Gruenberg, Max Zach, Strube, A. Maguarre, Clement Lenom, and, more recently, Agide Jacchia and Alfredo Casella.

Finally we have Arthur Fiedler, youthful and ingratiating, as popular as any, very likely, in the long history of Pops, revitalizing an institution that threatened to succumb to decay. More power to his good right arm!

Amusements

WILBUR LAST THREE TIMES

"BROKEN DISHE

With DONALD

Growth of Popular Taste Revealed By Season of the Pops

Globe June 22

By Morris Hastings

THE POP concerts at Symphony Hall are commencing the last two weeks of a season which has been more successful than any since those days, some four or five years ago, when Jacchia steered their course.

If, unlike Voltaire's Candide, who was content to cultivate his garden and let the world wag as it would, you decide to investigate the reason for this pleasant fact, several obvious factors jump out at you immediately.

In the first place, Arthur Fiedler, the present conductor, has kept the Pops "popular." Glance at almost any of his programs and you find them teeming with the dear, familiar names.

Selecting a program at random—which happens to be the one for next Wednesday—we find that it is made up of compositions by strictly melodious composers. There is the eminently whistleable march "On the Mall" by that expert bandmaster, Goldman. There is the Overture to Thomas "Mignon," a tasty bit of pastry.

On the same program there is a Fantasia from "Cavalleria Rusticana"—ever popular whether it be played on the violin, hand-organ or kazoo. "The Lost Chord," a sincere and well-loved "heart song," is not forgotten; nor is the solemn overture "1812."

But how, we well may ask, does Mr. Fiedler know precisely what public taste is? Might it not be that Mr. and Mrs. Average Citizen like to hear what Dr. Koussevitzky—or Mr. Fiedler think they should like to hear? Would audiences turn their thumbs down at a program which included a Beethoven symphony or a Richard Strauss tone-poem?

Many Great Names

Not that Mr. Fiedler omits what are familiarly called the "classics." He has played, and played exceedingly well, scenes from Moussorgsky's monumental "Boris Goudonov." He has included Wagnerian selections—"Meistersinger," "Lohengrin" and "Tannhauser."

Of more modern composers he has played Converse's adroit foolery, "Flivver Ten Million," fragments from Stravinsky's fantastic "Fire-Bird" Suite, a portion of Prokoffieff's barbaric "Scythian Suite."

All of these compositions — which our Mr. and Mrs. Average Citizen might popularly be supposed to dub "highbrow"—Mr. Fiedler has deftly tucked into a setting of what is known amongst members of the orchestra as "gum-drops," palatable but not particularly nourishing.

It is from the suggestions sent in by the public for "Request Night" that the conductor derives his information on "what the people want." This year when the ballots were counted, there was great astonishment at Symphony Hall. For, leading the list of compositions requested by a majority of two to one, was Ravel's "Bolero."

This Spanish impressionistic dance by the leader of French modernists has taken the popular fancy as have few other pieces of music in recent years. And, let cynics take notice, the "Bolero" is extremely fine music. What in the hands of a lesser composer might have been a mere show piece with its unchanging theme and rhythm emerges from the pen of Monsieur Ravel as a brilliant and genuinely evocative dance-poem.

The appearance of Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" on the list of "requests" was another surprise this year. Far from denoting the inferiority of popular taste, it reveals the fact that people are realizing to a greater extent the importance of this striking music by the most vital of our modern American composers.

As for the other members on the "request program," they stay about the same year in and year out. There are the Handel "Largo," "The Ride of the Valkyries," the "Blue Danube" and the "Peer Gynt Suite," to mention a few. Surely, no one will make so bold as to say that there is a measure of bad music in such a list.

Nor will anyone criticize the audiences at the Pops for the enthusiasm with which they greet Mr. Fiedler. Repeated hearings of the interpretations of this excellent musician convince us that he will go far. His tempi are always precise, his readings are clear and vigorous. And his comprehension is extraordinarily convincing.

OH, SIR THOMAS!

The concert given by the Philharmonic Orchestra of New York in Albert Hall, London, under the inspiring leadership of Toscanini, must have been a great occasion. The King and the Queen were there; George Bernard Shaw "wore a raincoat throughout the concert," although the roof did not leak, as that of Mechanics Hall used to do at times when grand opera was given there.

Yes, it was a great occasion, with but one "out" about it to Bostonians. Sir Thomas Beecham, the more or less eminent conductor, who has been to America, told the players "that they now surpassed the Boston and Philadelphia orchestras and were the best in the world."

Oh, Sir Thomas, how could you? You who, as guest conductor, led our incomparable Symphony Orchestra as recently as 1928, and declared then that it was the finest in the world. Has it gone back since then or has the Philharmonic gone forward? We are not disposed to admit either hypothesis.

May 31 Post

REDUCTION

RATIO

15x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

A3

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION[SM] RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

Interesting St. Louisans—William E. Walter

(Continued from Page 5.)

for the good of Poland. I thought he would take his political defeat very seriously. I expected to see him come in the figure of tragedy itself, as he used to do sometimes on tour when neuritis would attack his arm. But he didn't. He came in beaming.

"'At last I'm out of prison,' he said."

It was the job with the old National Orchestra that gave Walter his first experience at doctoring run-down symphony organizations. After he had straightened out some of its tangled affairs it was absorbed by the New York Philharmonic and his services were retained by the new society. Then, affairs of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra were getting in bad shape and Ossip Gabrilowitsch asked him to come out to Detroit and see what he could do. He went, and in three years as manager he put the flagging orchestra back on its feet. The Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia was the next patient, and then came an emergency call from St. Louis. The St. Louis orchestra was sinking rapidly and needed a doctor in a hurry. Indeed, it was a case worse even than that in Detroit. "Doctor" Walter came on the run and sat up with his patient late at night. And he pulled the patient through.

WILLIAM WALTER himself as authority for the statement that there is only one way to make an orchestra succeed. And that, he assures you, is not by exercising any magic touch. No orchestra is built up or rejuvenated by a magic touch.

"It is a matter," he says, "of playing the best music possible in the best manner possible. The best music is always available. The best manner depends on how much you can pay the director and the players, because your ability to secure an able director and able instrumentalists hangs on the price you can pay.

"An orchestra's growth always must be slow. It can never hope to pay its own way. It must be regarded as art galleries and public libraries are regarded. It must be largely maintained by the community as a cultural institution. While in one way the symphony orchestra is the most aristocratic of the arts, it is in another way the most democratic, because it appeals to all classes. The price of tickets, therefore, must be kept within the reach of all. A symphony orchestra can't charge musical comedy prices, and it still couldn't pay its own way if it did, because an orchestra can give only two or three performances a week.

"OUR WHOLE effort in the last three years has been to keep away from ballyhoo methods, to get the best conductors possible and give the best performance possible. Many great orchestras have tried sensational methods in an effort to popularize symphony and have always regretted it. Sensationalism doesn't go. That is accepted now as an axiom of the business. But at the same time the orchestra must present variety. It must play not only the classics but must also put modern music before the public in decent doses. As the art of music develops the symphony orchestra must keep up with it. Music changes, just as painting does. Symphony orchestras are becoming numerous now. There are 76 or 77 in the United States at the present time in cities ranging down to a population of 40,000, and they are operating on budgets that range from $20,000 to $950,000 a year. I get a lot of letters asking what this one or that one can do toward building up a better orchestra. There is only one thing to tell them, and I tell it to them: 'Play the best music possible with the best musicians you can hire.'"

WILLIAM E. WALTER.

By GUY FORSHE

Of the Post-Dispatch Sunday Magazine Staff

WHEN he w in Clevela lie Walter promise of ing, with t practice, a They even far as to ho some day he would be a concert pianist. But a millstone intervened—a very literal millstone in this instance. This millstone had been cast off in the belief that it would never do any more good in the world and had been left leaning against a fence. Willie used to play around it. One day it fell over on Willie's left hand and gave him a convincing excuse for refusing to practice. Thus, he relates now, that worn-out millstone whose usefulness was supposed to be ended saved the world from having to listen to one more very bad pianist.

Some 10 years later young Walter went to the University of Michigan. He specialized in Latin and Greek, with every intention of becoming a teacher of classical languages. Upon graduation he had some very good offers, too. But something intervened again. This time it was a stubborn mental disorder popularly called the "newspaper bug." He had worked on the college weekly, which is an almost certain source of infection. So, having been infected, he could do nothing but get a job as a reporter and let the disease run its course, as it was bound to do anyway. The result was, the world was spared another bad teacher. "Damned bad teacher," I think he said when he told me about it.

So it went. One thing or another saved the world from having to put up with William E. Walter in some role for which he was not fitted, and in time he recovered on his own power from the bite of the newspaper bug. By that time his course was cut out for him. It led in a roundabout way to the discovery that he had a peculiar genius for doctoring run-down symphony orchestras and putting them on their feet. He was somewhat late in getting around to it, but he became eventually a symphony orchestra doctor. He is manager of the rejuvenated St. Louis orchestra now; has been for three years. That's why it is rejuvenated—rejuvenated from an artistic standpoint, anyway. He has a way of putting new life into symphony orchestras and making the most of what is there already. "Doctor" is a more appropriate term in his case than manager. That is what they call him in the East, where he made his reputation in this pursuit—symphony doctor. At symphony doctoring he is hard to match. But his acquaintances say it was a "break" for everybody when Providence or whatever it was steered him away from pianism and teaching.

WHETHER William E. Walter looks the part of a symphony doctor I am unable to say. He is the first one I ever saw. But he doesn't look either like a concert pianist or a professor of classical languages. He is rather too jovial in appearance and manner and too well-fed looking. He is a short, stout man of 60, who appears to be at least 10 years younger; who laughs readily, talks volubly and never looks worried. He was evasive when I asked him if he attributed his disposition to the fact that he had remained a bachelor. He likes good food and is celebrated for his ability to procure it in hotels and restaurants where its presence is scarcely suspected by the average diner. The secret seems to be in knowing just what to tell the waiter to tell the chef. He likes good books, too. His suite at the Coronado Hotel contains a library of extraordinary proportions. He likes Balzac and Zola especially. He likes good music, likes to travel in Europe. He likes Paderewski.

He can talk for hours about the famous Polish pianist and statesman. He regards his association with Paderewski as the brightest spot in his life, brighter even than his three years on the staff of the old New York Sun under Charles A. Dana. The friendship had its beginning in the early nineteen hundreds, when Walter was engaged to travel ahead of Paderewski on an American tour and organize concerts for him. It continued through the years of the pianist's popularity on the American concert stage, and when Paderewski became Premier of Poland after the war Walter remained with him in Warsaw for several months as his American secretary. He got to know the Polish genius as few other persons have known him. "A man of really true nobility," he says of Paderewski. "A man of stupendous knowledge, in every sense a gentleman."

In his capacity, at various times, as music critic, press agent, concert organizer, symphony orchestra manager, he also got to know many other great artists, as well as innumerable lesser lights of the concert stage. He knew all of that galaxy of opera stars who shone so brightly in the nineties and early nineteen hundreds. Homer, Sembrich, Melba, Eames, Nordica, Calve, Caruso—the list is a long one. That period was a sort of golden age of singers. It produced great instrumentalists, too. But Paderewski, he declares, was the greatest personality of them all and is the greatest personality in music at the present time.

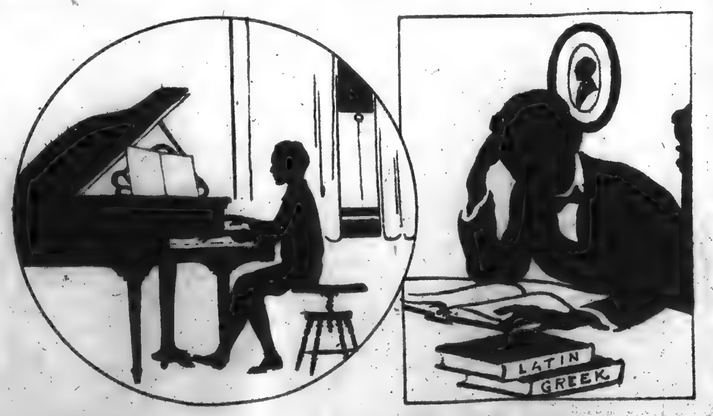
"All great artists," he asserts, "are great for something besides their music. Unless they are they seldom become great artists. They must create for themselves a rich background either of culture or character. Paderewski has both. He is a great musician who is many-sided. He has the mind of a philosopher."

Next to Paderewski, the subject William Walter likes best to talk about is the old New York Sun. What a newspaper the Sun was! How newspapers have changed since the days of Charles A. Dana! Reporters had to dig for news in those days and write it themselves. There was no such thing as a rewrite man. There was hardly such a thing as a typewriter. Dana wouldn't have them in the office. They made too much noise. Reporters had to come in and write their stuff in longhand with purple ink on yellow paper.

And what stuff they could write! Of course, no old-timer of the Sun staff would ever concede now that a modern reporter knows how to get a story or to write it.

WALTER worked three and a half years for the Sun. Before that he worked for two years on the staff of the Cleveland Press. Before that—but I may as well go back to the beginning. He was born in Cleveland in 1869 of New England stock. He was—and is—the elder of two brothers, the younger being no less a personage than Eugene Walter, the distinguished playwright. William finished a four-year high school course in three and went to the University of Michigan.

After two years his money ran out and he appealed to an uncle, Prof. Edward L. Walter of Michigan, for aid. Uncle Edward said William was too frivolous and would have to show evidence of realization that life was something besides a succession of cocktails. So he went to work polishing windows and doorknobs in a Cleveland drug store. After a year of that Uncle Edward was convinced and sent for William to come back to school. William went, and by way of further demonstrating his seriousness of purpose, proceeded to win admitttance to Phi Beta Kappa. He was graduated in the class of 1892. It



9X

173

William E. Walter

...ng Orch...estras ... Great

...was ... at this point ... the deadly ...spaper bug got ... its work and ...am became a ...ter. He fell ...stairs getting ...e office when ...Cleveland Press ...ed him $15 a ...

...used to read ... New York pa... regularly," he ...es, "and, like' ... young report... of the time, ...y decided that ... wasn't worth ...ng unless I ...l get on the ... staff. I finally ... to New York ... about the first ...g I saw was the ... dome of the ... York World ...lding. Right ...e I almost for... the Sun for the ...rld. I went on ... the Sun office, ...wever, and to my ...prise they hired ...

'As an experi...ed reporter, I ... $15 a week to ...rt, and eventu... was put on ...s rates, which ...e it possible to ... at least $35 a ... Columns ... columns then, ... unleaded non... type. It took ...t of digging to ...one. I got to ... regarded as a ...ight young man,' ...t so far as I can ...member now, ...ut the only per...ent contribu...n I made to ...rnalism was the ...vention of the ...ord 'peepul.' I ...ce reported a ...ech Henry Clay ...lzer made from ...cart in Mulberry ...reet, and in writ...g my story spelled ...erything phonet...ally. 'Peepul' ...s the only word ...t caught hold."

...n from a space... reporter to a ...chestra manager ...any way you look ...'s case it was so ...ars now to have ...natural develop... he became deeply ...

He refers to that ...he started to "get ... over to the New ...Advertiser as music ...here six years.

...ewspaper reporter ... music critic he ... is already entering into a ...tional phase of some kind, ...h it's usually hard telling what ...ng to emerge from the transition. ...er emerged as opera press agent. ...worked for Henry W. Savage, who ... producing "Parsifal" in English. ...ty soon came the tour with Pad...wski and Walter then found he ... saved $1000, a discovery which he celebrated by going to Europe and staying there until he had spent it all. It fastened upon him the horrible habit of going abroad every year.

After that his summer address was always Paris or Berlin or Vienna or some other continental city. For some 13 years a job as press agent for the Boston Symphony Orchestra made that possible. It had other advantages, too. It enabled him to learn the delicate technique of arranging symphony programs, making up annual deficits and handling temperamental performers. It brought about his intimate acquaintance with a number of famous artists. One valuable friendship was that with Dr. Karl Muck, whom Walter regards as the greatest symphony conductor ever to wield a baton.

WALTER liked Boston. He says he stayed there too long. It was the war that took him away. He was unable to get into a combatant branch of service, so went along with the Y. M. C. A. to do concert organization work on the western front. That was in 1918. Producing entertainments for soldiers immediately after the war, he got to Paris every now and then and saw a great deal of his old friend, Paderewski. Paderewski had come to Paris as one of the Polish delegates to the peace conference. When he returned to Warsaw as Premier of Poland he took Walter along with him.

"As secretary, I wrote a few state papers," Walter relates, "and watched the wheels go round in Polish politics. That was a lean but interesting year. We were never hungry but were frequently cold. Czecho-Slovakia controlled the coal supply and hated Poland. As a result, there wasn't a hotel in Warsaw that was heated on both sides at the same time. I would have enjoyed staying longer in Warsaw, but the invading bolsheviki were getting close to the city and I was sent to conduct a trainload of women and children to Paris. There I got a cablegram asking me to come back to New York and take charge of affairs of the old National Symphony Orchestra. I was flattered and accepted before I thought. So here I am, a symphony orchestra manager."

The years since then have been more profitable in a financial sense. But he looks back with greater fondness on those hectic and exciting months in Europe during and following the war. He had during that period several glimpses of the soul of Paderewski under circumstances that stamped them in his memory.

"I remember particularly the night of July 31, 1914," he relates. "It was a tragic night. The war had begun. Nobody knew where or how it would end. I had left Brussels on the night of July 29 for Switzerland, to be present at a fete to be given at Paderewski's home in Morges. As it turned out, I traveled on the last through train that went out of Brussels until after the war. Swiss soldiers in uniform were hastening to the border to go on frontier duty the next day. War was in the air. I was one of many Americans caught in Europe and wondering how I was going to get out. The scene at Paderewski's home was one of both comedy and tragedy. Four distinguished pianists were there, and all were playing jazz—four playing at once on two pianos—Ernest Schelling, Josef Hofmann, Opienski and Stowjowski. I never saw such a sight. An air of hysteria seemed to reign. In the next room were Paderewski, David Jayne Hill, former United States Ambassador to Germany, and several French, English and Swiss diplomats. They kept the telephones busy all night talking to Rome, London and Paris. Paderewski seemed unusually calm and serious. The war clouds had affected him deeply. I shall never forget the picture he presented when at dawn he stood on the terrace with a group of statesmen and musicians around him.

"'GENTLEMEN,' he said, 'the time of reckoning has come. I don't know whether it will be six months or six years. But, believe me, gentlemen, Germany is beaten and Poland will be free.'

"Incidentally, it was through Paderewski and his influence that President Wilson incorporated the freedom of Poland among his famous Fourteen Points.

"There is another incident I won't forget. It happened in Morges in the spring of 1920. Paderewski's finances were in a shocking condition. He had sacrificed everything—time, money, effort—for Poland. He had abandoned music in the spring of 1918 to devote

(Concluded on Page 8.)

INTERESTING ST. LOUISANS

William E. Walter

Symphony Manager Who Is Specialist in Doctoring Ailing Orchestras and Whose Acquaintanceship Includes All of the Great Musical Figures of the Last Forty Years.

By GUY FORSHEY

Of the Post-Dispatch Sunday Magazine Staff

WHEN he was a boy in Cleveland, Willie Walter showed promise of becoming, with time and practice, a pianist. They even went so far as to hope that some day he would be a concert pianist. But a millstone intervened—a very literal millstone in this instance. This millstone had been cast off in the belief that it would never do any more good in the world and had been left leaning against a fence. Willie used to play around it. One day it fell over on Willie's left hand and gave him a convincing excuse for refusing to practice. Thus, he relates now, that worn-out millstone whose usefulness was supposed to be ended saved the world from having to listen to one more very bad pianist.

Some 10 years later young Walter went to the University of Michigan. He specialized in Latin and Greek, with every intention of becoming a teacher of classical languages. Upon graduation he had some very good offers, too. But something intervened again. This time it was a stubborn mental disorder popularly called the "newspaper bug." He had worked on the college weekly, which is an almost certain source of infection. So, having been infected, he could do nothing but get a job as a reporter and let the disease run its course, as it was bound to do anyway. The result was, the world was spared another bad teacher. "Damned bad teacher," I think he said when he told me about it.

So it went. One thing or another saved the world from having to put up with William E. Walter in some role for which he was not fitted, and in time he recovered on his own power from the bite of the newspaper bug. By that time his course was cut out for him. It led in a roundabout way to the discovery that he had a peculiar genius for doctoring run-down symphony orchestras and putting them on their feet. He was somewhat late in getting around to it, but he became eventually a symphony orchestra doctor. He is manager of the rejuvenated St. Louis orchestra now; has been for three years. That's why it is rejuvenated—rejuvenated from an artistic standpoint, anyway. He has a way of putting new life into symphony orchestras and making the most of what is there already. "Doctor" is a more appropriate term in his case than manager. That is what they call him in the East, where he made his reputation in this pursuit—symphony doctor. At symphony doctoring he is hard to match. But his acquaintances say it was a "break" for everybody when Providence or whatever it was steered him away from pianism and teaching.

WHETHER William E. Walter looks the part of a symphony doctor I am unable to say. He is the first one I ever saw. But he doesn't look either like a concert pianist or a professor of classical languages. He is rather too jovial in appearance and manner and too well-fed looking. He is a short, stout man of 60, who appears to be at least 10 years younger; who laughs readily, talks volubly and never looks worried. He was evasive when I asked him if he attributed his disposition to the fact that he had remained a bachelor. He likes good food and is celebrated for his ability to procure it in hotels and restaurants where its presence is scarcely suspected by the average diner. The secret seems to be in knowing just what to tell the waiter to tell the chef. He likes good books, too. His suite at the Coronado Hotel contains a library of extraordinary proportions. He likes Balzac and Zola especially. He likes good music, likes to travel in Europe. He likes Paderewski.

He can talk for hours about the famous Polish pianist and statesman. He regards his association with Paderewski as the brightest spot in his life, brighter even than his three years on the staff of the old New York Sun under Charles A. Dana. The friendship had its beginning in the early nineteen hundreds, when Walter was engaged to travel ahead of Paderewski on an American tour and organize concerts for him. It continued through the years of the pianist's popularity on the American concert stage, and when Paderewski became Premier of Poland after the war Walter remained with him in Warsaw for several months as his American secretary. He got to know the Polish genius as few other persons have known him. "A man of really true nobility," he says of Paderewski. "A man of stupendous knowledge, in every sense a gentleman."

In his capacity, at various times, as music critic, press agent, concert organizer, symphony orchestra manager, he also got to know many other great artists, as well as innumerable lesser lights of the concert stage. He knew all of that galaxy of opera stars who shone so brightly in the nineties and early nineteen hundreds. Homer, Sembrich, Melba, Eames, Nordica, Calve, Caruso—the list is a long one. That period was a sort of golden age of singers. It produced great instrumentalists, too. But Paderewski, he declares, was the greatest personality of them all and is the greatest personality in music at the present time.

"All great artists," he asserts, "are great for something besides their music. Unless they are they seldom become great artists. They must create for themselves a rich background either of culture or character. Paderewski has both. He is a great musician who is many-sided. He has the mind of a philosopher."

Next to Paderewski, the subject William Walter likes best to talk about is the old New York Sun. What a newspaper the Sun was! How newspapers have changed since the days of Charles A. Dana! Reporters had to dig for news in those days and write it themselves. There was no such thing as a rewrite man. There was hardly such a thing as a typewriter. Dana wouldn't have them in the office. They made too much noise. Reporters had to come in and write their stuff in longhand with purple ink on yellow paper.

And what stuff they could write! Of course, no old-timer of the Sun staff would ever concede now that a modern reporter knows how to get a story or to write it.

WALTER worked three and a half years for the Sun. Before that he worked for two years on the staff of the Cleveland Press. Before that—but I may as well go back to the beginning. He was born in Cleveland in 1869 of New England stock. He was—and is—the elder of two brothers, the younger being no less a personage than Eugene Walter, the distinguished playwright. William finished a four-year high school course in three and went to the University of Michigan.

After two years his money ran out and he appealed to an uncle, Prof. Edward L. Walter of Michigan, for aid. Uncle Edward said William was too frivolous and would have to show evidence of realization that life was something besides a succession of cocktails. So he went to work polishing windows and doorknobs in a Cleveland drug store. After a year of that Uncle Edward was convinced and sent for William to come back to school. William went, and by way of further demonstrating his seriousness of purpose, proceeded to win admitttance to Phi Beta Kappa. He was graduated in the class of 1892. It was at this point that the deadly newspaper bug got its work and William became a reporter. He fell downstairs getting to the office when the Cleveland Press hired him $15 a week.

"I used to read the New York papers regularly," he relates, "and, like every young reporter of the time, I early decided that Cleveland wasn't worth working unless I could get on the New York staff. I finally got to New York and about the first thing I saw was the golden dome of the New York World building. Right there I almost forgot the Sun for the moment. I went on the Sun office, however, and to my surprise they hired me.

"As an experienced reporter, I got $15 a week to start, and eventually was put on space rates, which made it possible to earn at least $35 a week. Columns were columns then, not unleaded nonpareil type. It took a lot of digging to get one. I got to be regarded as a 'bright young man,' as far as I can remember now, but the only permanent contribution I made to journalism was the invention of the word 'peepul.' I once reported a speech Henry Clay Pulitzer made from a cart in Mulberry Street, and in writing my story spelled everything phonetically. 'Peepul' was the only word that caught hold."

The transition from a space-writer reporter to a symphony orchestra manager is quite a transition any way you look at it, but in Walter's case it was so gradual that it seemed to have been a logical development. About 1890 he became deeply interested in music. He refers to that time as the time when he started to "get foolish." He went over to the New York Commercial Advertiser as music critic and stayed there six years.

WHEN a newspaper reporter becomes a music critic he is already entering into a professional phase of some kind, although it's usually hard telling what to emerge from the transition. Walter emerged an opera press agent. He worked for Henry W. Savage, who was producing "Parsifal" in English. Pretty soon came the tour with Paderewski and Walter then found he had saved $1000, a discovery which he celebrated by going to Europe and staying there until he had spent it all. It fastened upon him the horrible habit of going abroad every year.

After that his summer address was always Paris or Berlin or Vienna or some other continental city. For some 13 years a job as press agent for the Boston Symphony Orchestra made that possible. It had other advantages, too. It enabled him to learn the delicate technique of arranging symphony programs, making up annual deficits and handling temperamental performers. It brought about his intimate acquaintance with a number of famous artists. One valuable friendship was that with Dr. Karl Muck, whom Walter regards as the greatest symphony conductor ever to wield a baton.

WALTER liked Boston. He says he stayed there too long. It was the war that took him away. He was unable to get into a combatant branch of service, so went along with the Y. M. C. A. to do concert organization work on the western front. That was in 1918. Producing entertainments for soldiers immediately after the war, he got to Paris every now and then and saw a great deal of his old friend, Paderewski. Paderewski had come to Paris as one of the Polish delegates to the peace conference. When he returned to Warsaw as Premier of Poland he took Walter along with him.

"As secretary, I wrote a few state papers," Walter relates, "and watched the wheels go round in Polish politics. That was a lean but interesting year. We were never hungry but were frequently cold. Czecho-Slovakia controlled the coal supply and hated Poland. As a result, there wasn't a hotel in Warsaw that was heated on both sides at the same time. I would have enjoyed staying longer in Warsaw, but the invading bolsheviki were getting close to the city and I was sent to conduct a trainload of women and children to Paris. There I got a cablegram asking me to come back to New York and take charge of the affairs of the old National Symphony Orchestra. I was flattered and accepted before I thought. So here I am, a symphony orchestra manager."

The years since then have been more profitable in a financial sense. But he looks back with greater fondness on those hectic and exciting months in Europe during and following the war. He had during that period several glimpses of the soul of Paderewski under circumstances that stamped them in his memory.

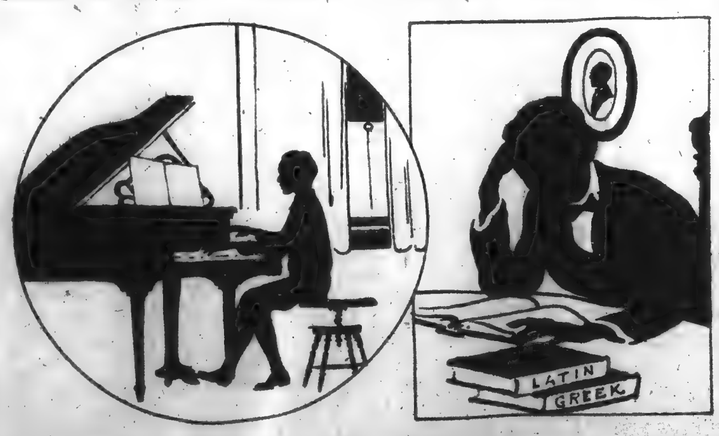
"I remember particularly the night of July 31, 1914," he relates. "It was a tragic night. The war had begun. Nobody knew where or how it would end. I had left Brussels on the night of July 29 for Switzerland, to be present at a fete to be given at Paderewski's home in Morges. As it turned out, I traveled on the last through train that went out of Brussels until after the war. Swiss soldiers in uniform were hastening to the border to go on frontier duty the next day. War was in the air. I was one of many Americans caught in Europe and wondering how I was going to get out. The scene at Paderewski's home was one of both comedy and tragedy. Four distinguished pianists were there, and all were playing jazz—four playing at once on two pianos—Ernest Schelling, Josef Hofmann, Opienski and Stowjowski. I never saw such a sight. An air of hysteria seemed to reign. In the next room were Paderewski, David Jayne Hill, former United States Ambassador to Germany, and several French, English and Swiss diplomats. They kept the telephones busy all night talking to Rome, London and Paris. Paderewski seemed unusually calm and serious. The war clouds had affected him deeply. I shall never forget the picture he presented when at dawn he stood on the terrace with a group of statesmen and musicians around him.

"'GENTLEMEN,' he said, 'the time of reckoning has come. I don't know whether it will be six months or six years. But, believe me, gentlemen, Germany is beaten and Poland will be free.'

"Incidentally, it was through Paderewski and his influence that President Wilson incorporated the freedom of Poland among his famous Fourteen Points.

"There is another incident I won't forget. It happened in Morges in the spring of 1920. Paderewski's finances were in a shocking condition. He had sacrificed everything—time, money, effort—for Poland. He had abandoned music in the spring of 1918 to devote

(Concluded on Page 5.)



WILLIAM E. WALTER.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

BLANK PAGE

Shipman's Scrap Book
FOR DUPLICATE ORDER NUMBER 911
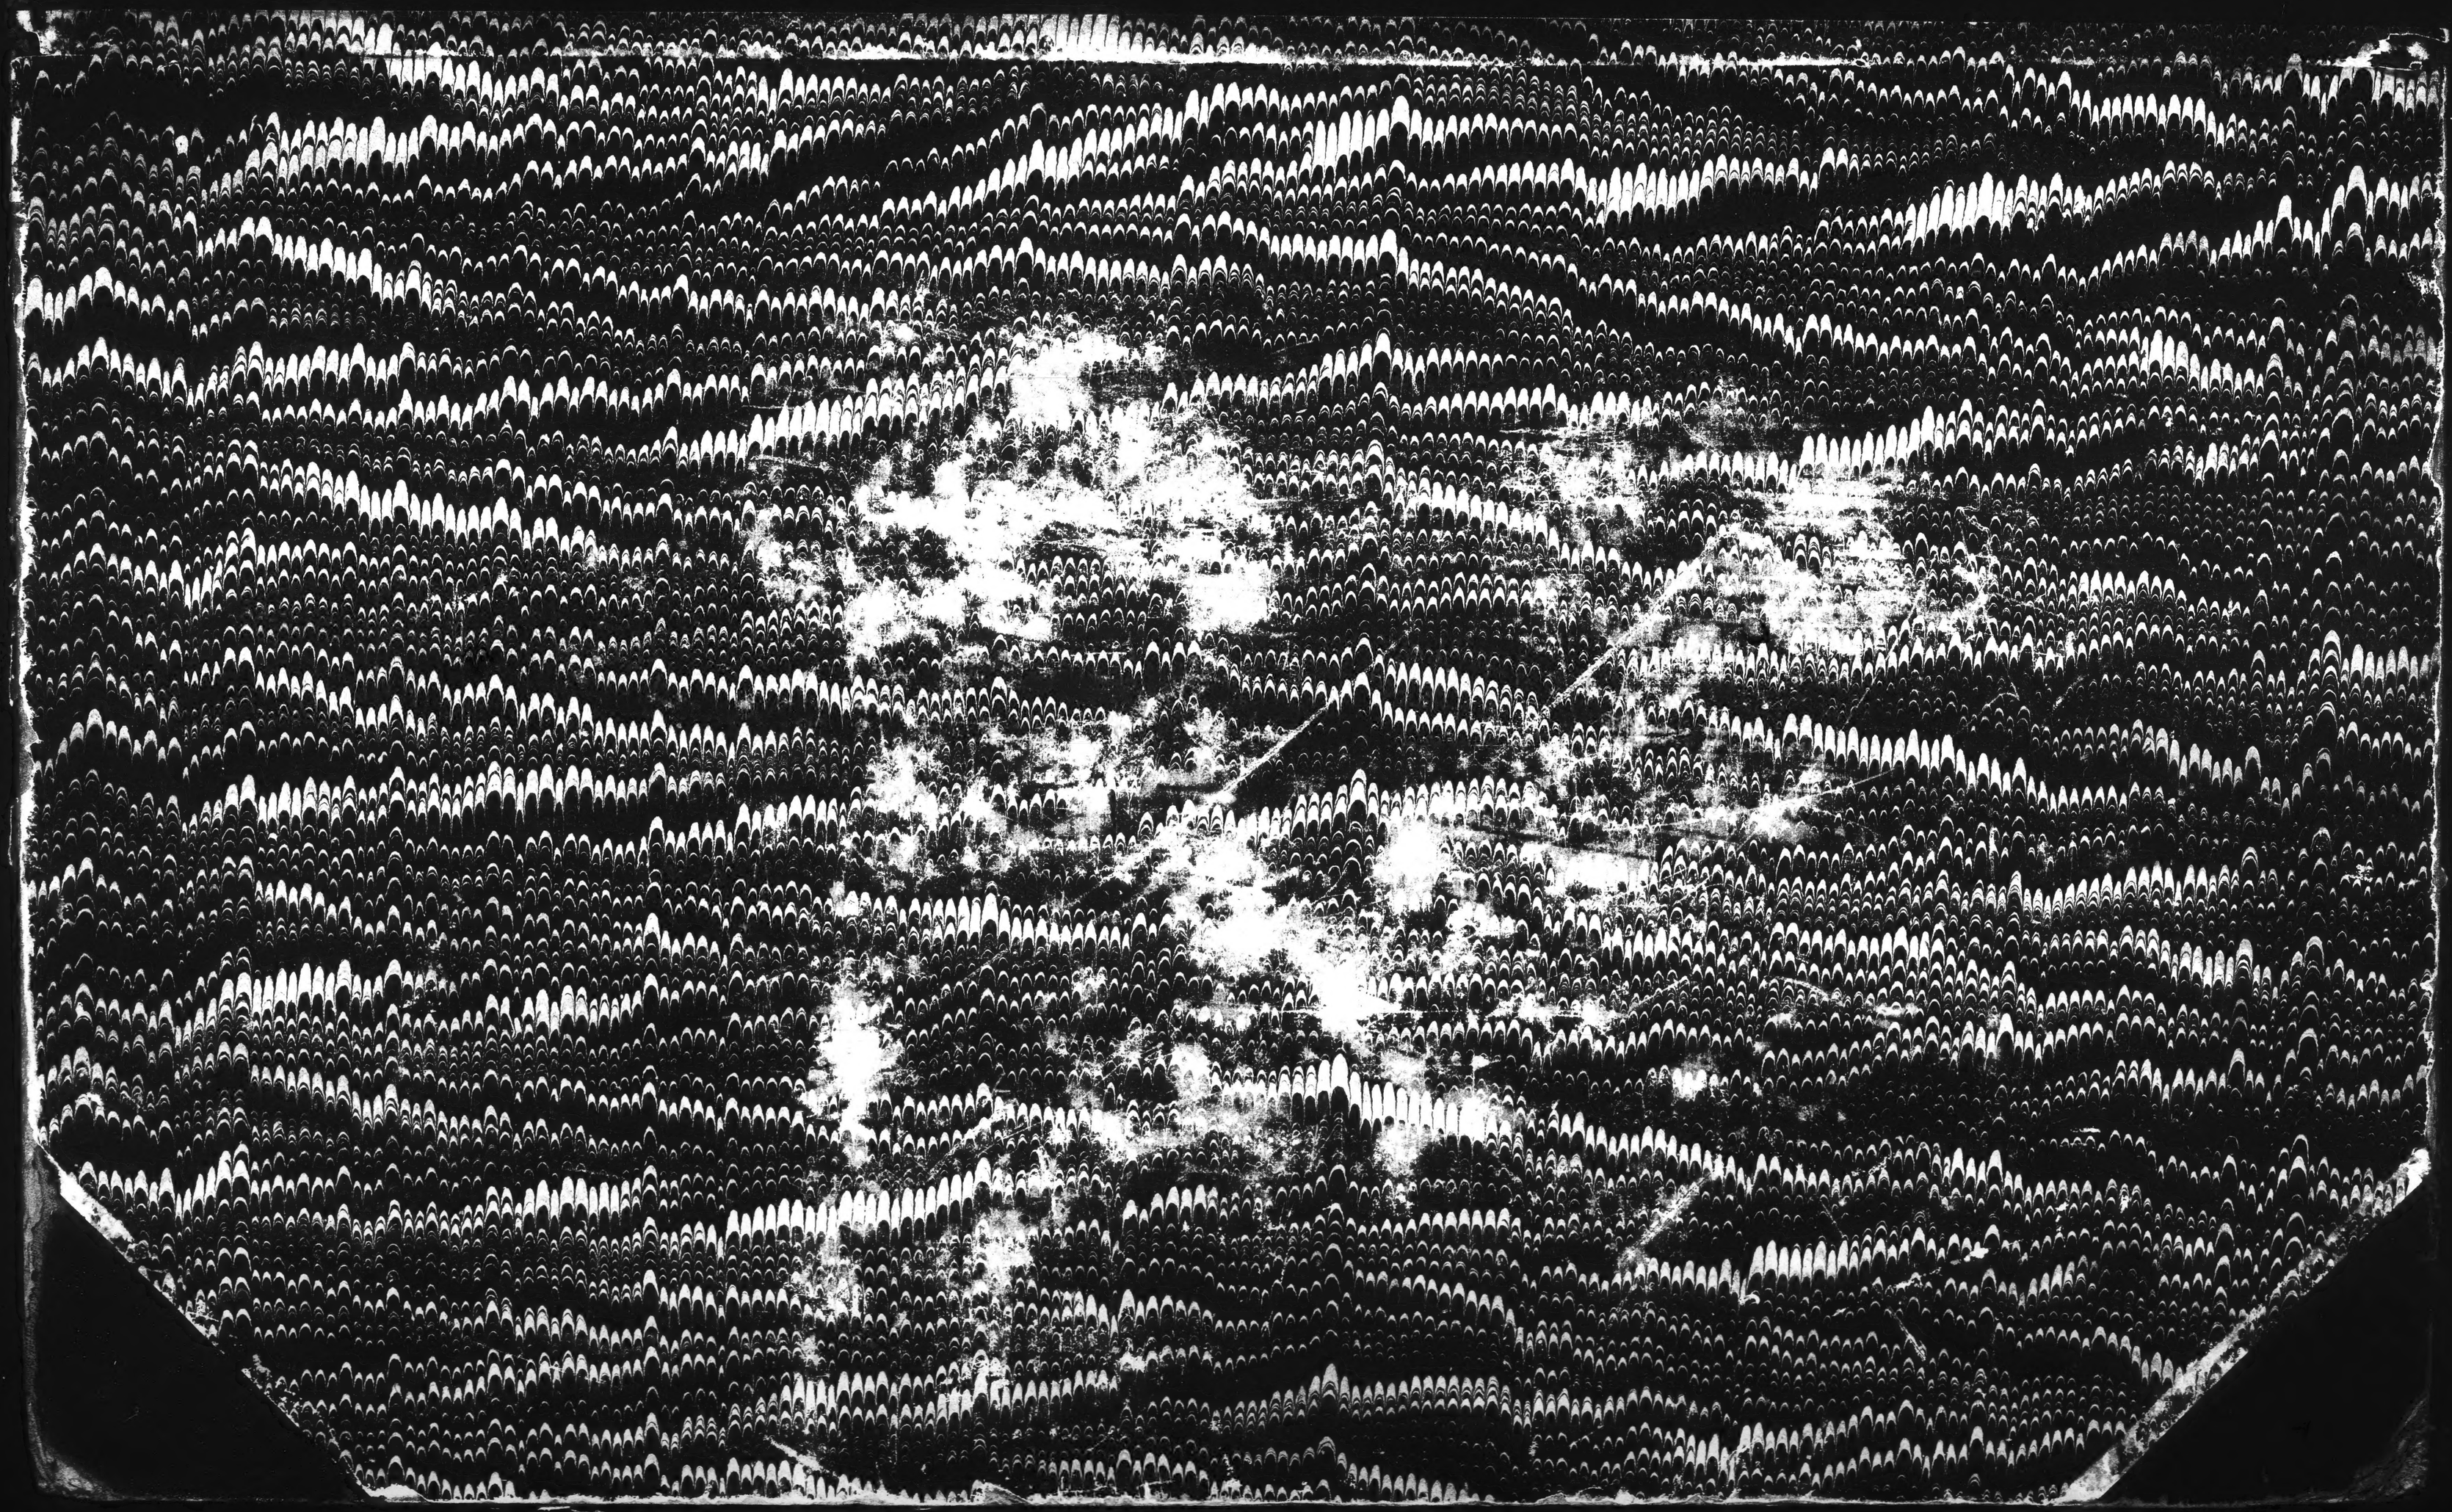
ASA L. SHIPMAN'S SONS
NEW YORK



END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE REWIND